

VII.

Let velvet moss o'er the slumberer creep
Where the bones of her red forefathers sleep,
And the spot be marked with no other sign
Than some old familiar oak, or pine :—
Better a quiet place of rest,
With the turf of home upon her breast,
Than the proudest tomb that trophied Art
Could build to cover her mouldering heart.

