MME. GAILLAUX TELLS FULL STORY

Why and How She Shot Paris Figaro Editor

THREAT BY HUSBAND

Idea of Call at Paper Office Came From Remark of M. Caillaux—Lost Head When She Faced Calmette in His Editorial Room

(New York Sun.) Paris, March 27.—Mme. Caillaux told today the detailed story of how she killed Gaston Calmette, editor of the Figaro, and the causes which drove her to the act. In the course of the examination she said she took upon her shoulders the burden of grieving her husband for the attacks on his honor and integrity because she believed his country needed him and she was willing to sacrifice herself for his sake.

Tells Story Coolly. When the interrogation began Magistrate Bouchard asked Mme. Caillaux to describe fully her actions on Monday, March 16, the day Calmette was shot. The prisoner, answered in a very collected manner, laying stress on each point which tended to prove her assertion that she had no intention of killing M. Calmette. She said:

"About 10.30 a. m. Pierre de Fougères, sub-director of the Protocol, telephoned and asked at what hour my husband and myself were going to the dinner at the Italian embassy. I replied about 8.30 and added: 'I'm counting on you to assist me in placing the guests for the official dinner at the Ministry of Finance on March 28.' I then telephoned to my hair-dresser to come at eleven o'clock. My manœuvre came at eleven. Three quarters of an hour later I went to the office of M. Gaillard, a dentist, and made arrangements with him for another visit on Wednesday afternoon at 2.30."

"It was then, midday, and I went to the Ministry of Finance to fetch my husband in the automobile for luncheon at our home. I told my husband what M. Motier, a lawyer, said about a suit against Calmette. It was to the effect that nothing could be done in the way of a defamation suit, which would drag on for a long time unless the question of the incompetence of a civil tribunal to deal with the matter was raised and also that the assizes would acquit the defamers in triumph.

Caillaux Made Threat. "M. Caillaux was furious, and exclaimed in an excited manner: 'Since there is nothing that can be done legally I'll smash a threat from him was most serious, as it showed that he meant violence against M. Calmette.'

"It was at this moment that the idea of forestalling my husband germinated in my brain, driving me to commit an act of violence myself."

Mme. Caillaux's line of defence was now clear. She was convinced that Calmette would publish more letters and her husband's threat acted like a spark to a train of powder. She said:

"The luncheon was deplorable and I decided to dismiss the cook and engage another the next day. When I was left alone my head began to work. I was terrified at my husband's threat. I could see that there was nothing to do but make a last effort to move M. Calmette. These emotions affected me so that I telephoned to the Italian embassy that my health would not permit me to attend the dinner."

"Then my mind was beset with one thought. I saw as in a nightmare my husband, who is an excellent shot, going to kill Calmette. I saw him in the assize court. I saw all the terrible consequences of the drama unrolled before my eyes, and I asked what was the cause which had decided my husband to do this—to prevent me from being slandered."

Decided to Act. "The feeling grew in me that it was I who should make the final effort; that I, as the cause of this horror, should do it or attempt anything to prevent it."

Here Mme. Caillaux stopped and sighed deeply. She seemed to be fatigued. Magistrate Bouchard asked her at what hour she left her house. She replied: "Having been invited to tea at a hotel in the Place Vendôme, I put on afternoon dress and left the house at three o'clock. I went first to a servants' agency to engage a new cook to come the next day. Then I went to Gastine Renette's to buy a revolver."

Judge Bouchard asked her if she had then decided to commit an act of violence. Mme. Caillaux replied: "Not yet, but I was strongly considering the possibility. Moreover, I intended to accompany my husband to Sarthe for the election campaign and needed a revolver because we would be automobiling at night. I gave this reason for the purchase of the revolver at the gun-seller's where I was known, as he had also supplied M. Caillaux with a revolver."

"The gunsmith first showed me an ordinary revolver at ninety-five francs ($15). The pull was too hard and I hurt my finger in handling it so I chose
