Brinful of heart interest. Human to the core; "Parentage" is a forceful combination of pathos, humor and thought. The characters are all plain folks like you and your neighbors.

Five Wonderful Acts and a Prologue.

The Reverend Thos. B. Gregory says: "The danger of indolence, the curse of having nothing to do, the double damnation of an aimless life, with its irresolution, nauses and despair—all this is brought home to you in the picture with a 'great waiting light'—a light that fairly makes you shudder."

Endorsed by the press, public and pulpit.

Men and women as they actually are in the world.

It lifts the blinds on society's glass houses.

It tears the mask of hypocrisy from humanity.

It presents a study of conditions in four groups of humanity. A man and wife drifting apart; the workman's family, who fall to see anything but the sorrows about them; the young man who pulls his community down by his own villainess, instead of lifting it by worth-while thoughts; and the working girl who chafes under home restraint and attempts to steer her own course, generally with disastrous results.

ADMISSION 25c.
