CHAPTER IX.

The balance of this singular night in day that almost precipitates a bloody war between the valiant little South Amerithe world has ever seen.

It opens auspiciously for Jack.

As he comes down stairs he is accosted by a man who has just entered Valparaiso's chief caravansary—a man upon whom the dust of travel rests, and who has undoubtedly ridden far and hard.

At sight of him Doctor Jack receives a shock, for although the man's face is soiled with dust and perspiration, he recognizes him.

"Kirks Smith!" bursts from his lips. The man holds out his hand, which is seized by Doctor Jack and heartily squeezed. Then the two step aside to a quiet corner where they may talk without being overheard, for already several Chillians watch them with interest.

"You are twelve hours ahead, Kirke. What am I to believe, good or bad news?" is the first thing Jack Evans asks. Beautiful White Cake SOAP to find.

Doctor Jack preserves his wonderful calmness, although his whole fortune is at stake. The man's nerve is simply astonishing, and it has won him more than one battle in the past.

"Explain what you mean, my dear fellow. Have you brought it with you?"

"Yes; lost it on the way and recovered it again. I've ridden like Satan, Jack, and met with some adventures that will do to amuse you another time." do to amuse you another time."
"Quite right—they'll keep, Now, where

"Concealed outside the city. I dared not bring it in until I had seen you."
Doctor Jack heaves a deep sigh of re-

I am surrounded by enemies here, and can hardly turn without knocking the elbow of a man who hopes to rick a curred." the other gives a low whistle of surprise, but his face expresses no alarm. Kirke Smith has been in some of the most desperate situations ever faced by a human being, and no one ever knew him to flind him one one ever knew him to flind him.

Up comes Larry at this juncture, and is delighted to see the man for whom Jack has been waiting, on the ground. His idea is that they can go on board the steamer at once, but is met by the reply that, however profitable such a move might be, it is not to be thought more might be, it is not to be thought of until evening comes.

A boat will be engaged and kept in waiting at a certain point most convenient and when they have secured that which Kirke Smith dares not bring into Valparaiso in broad daylight, a short pull will bring them to the steamer.

All they must avoid will be the Argus eyes of the enemies whom Jack and his trusted agent have thus far baffled, and it may be set down as certain that these men will be constantly on the alert. it may be set down as certain that these men will be constantly on the alert.

The hard rider who comes from the nitrate region of Chill goes to brush up a little, and then appears ready for breakfast. Avis joins them, and in low tones they converse. Kirke has much of dramatic interest to tell, and holds them spell-bound while he relates his adventures. To not a soul, however, does he confide the secret of where he has hidden that treasure which he has carried so far, and defended as only a brave man could.
Who can tell what hostile ears may not be bent to catch his words? The secret must only be whispered in the solitude of privacy, if spoken at all.

must only be whispered in the solitude of privacy, if spoken at all.

Larry has something on his mind—this fast Doctor Jack notices, and it causes him to watch the little man curlously. Perhaps he has fallen in love with the beautiful senorita to whom Doctor Jack owed his trouble on the preseding night. As this thought flashes through his mind it troubles him, since the duds can be as stubborn as a mule once his mind is made up, and it is hoped he will sail when they do.

So Jack determines to put him on the rack, Larry knows something—that is evident—and his tongue once limbered presently discourses upon the subject uppermost in his thoughts,

"I have weceived a lettah this a.m.—a communication of immense importance, dear boy. You wemember the lovely chawmer upon whose shoulder your heartily.

"She's after new game, Another sun has risen above the horizon, and, by Jove! this one isn't mortgaged, either," pulling at the shadowy fringe that adorns his cheeks.

"Am I to understand it is you, Larry!" The small man puffs out his chest until he resembles a pouter pigeon.

"I'm the victim of her second passion—a case of love at first sight. I fancied that she twembled last night when I looked at her—a powerful sight of magnetism in that glames, dear boy," and he accompanies his words with a laugh that puzzles the doctor.

"An a planation is in order.

It seems that he did not venture to call upon the senorits until the afternoon, when, rigged out in what he deemed his most killing suit, with perfumed hand herchief and every hair on his head in puzzles the doctor.

There are only a few lines:—
"The Senorita Marilla de los Vegos' compliments to Senor Lawrence Kennedy, hoping he will call again to-day, when she may receive him in a more hospitable manner than last night."
Doctor Jack sneers at the wording of the note. To him it is as plain as the nose on Larry's face, or the eye-glass he loves to sport. The trouble may be in explaining it. Larry has a hump of conceit out of all proportion to his size. These small people are generally inclined to be very important, and can strut about better than six-footers.
"I'm afraid there's a trap back of this, Larry. She may have conceived a sudden

"I'm afraid there's a trap back of this, Larry. She may have conceived a sudden fancy for you, my boy, granted, but hate is stronger than love any day in ruling the heart, and she will use you to further her plans."

Larry shuts one eye and looks as wise as an owl while ogling his companion.

"Will she, Jack? My dear boy, you don't weally know me. I have made women a life study—the deah owetures may deceive others, but in Larry Ken nedy they have a master. Yes, I shall do myself the honor of calling upon this chawming senorita—she smiled at me last night"—Jack almost takes a fit in suppressing his laughter as he recollects last night"—Jack almost takes a fit in suppressing his laughter as he recollects the syrful look on Marilla's face, as she made that wicked jab with her dagger, and the agility with which Senor Larry sprang aside—"she will advance another step and allow me to kiss her hand to day—the darling."

"And meanwhile manage to worm your secrets out. Ah, Larry, take care!" uneasily, for much is involved.

"Jack, you've seen me in tight places. I'm no fool, if some people will imagine it. I shall have a clevah story arranged that will deceive the angelic cweature. Trust me."

Probably he has learned a lesson, and will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love will not be in a hurry to again make love a chiliance in the low in the serve him to their garments, and rub some vaseline upon the scratches on his face.

Upon the whole Larry has done well, and picked up several little points of interest, at the expense of his best suit, with his ruined. That seems to grieve him more than any soreness of body, for he has believed himself almost invincible in that checkered triumph of the tailor's art.

The adventure proves one thing—Marilla has not given up her game, because folled.

Trust me."

And Jack, remembering the past, feels that for him to doubt the abilities of this queer little genius is an insult—so he squeezes his hand.

"Your pardon, my boy. I might have known you were too sensible to be easily deceived, and that what you attempted would be with an eye to our success."

"That's it, Jack. I believe I can turn the tables on the senorita. While I appear to be wax-work in her hands, she will be dwopping hints that may give us a big pull. So au revoir, comrade, until we meet again."

"Be merciful, Larry. Don't lacerate the poor girl's feelings too dreadfully. Think of the pangs of unrequited affection—of a broken heart bowed down with grief, of—"

"Ah! there, quit it, doctor. Hang it, "Ah! there in the control of the part of the part

"Ah! there, quit it, doctor. Hang it, do you take me for a dreadful Don Juan?" and Larry rushes away with a grin on his monkey face—to meet the divine senorita and engage in a little game of deception where the keenest of wit will come out ahead.

Nor does Doctor Jack see him again for some hours. Indeed, the day is almost spent when Larry once more shows up.

During the course of the hours spent together, Jack and Kirke Smith have come to a good understanding connected with certain matters, and their plans are well arranged for the near future, though of course subject to change in case of necessity.

Doctor Jack has managed to engage quarters on the steamer that sails north the value of the plans are well arranged for the near future, though of course subject to change in case of necessity.

Their recent victory causes them to feet that they can insult the United States with impulity.

"There's trouble brewing," says Doctor Jack, as he notes these things, and his experience has been extended enough to make him a good judge.

He has an apponitment at a certain hour with Kirke Smith, who has been absent from the city during the afternoon. Larry has engaged to conduct A vis to the spot where they rendezvous. Trunks have been secretly smuggled from the fonda by a rear door and sent on board the steamer. They flatter them selves that this has been done without the knowledge of hostile forces, and perhaps it may be so.

Doctor Jack has managed to engage quarters on the steamer that sails north at dawn of the next day, and this has been done without visiting the vessel. A sailor whom he knows, belonging to the ship Keneenaw, anchored near the steamer in the harbor, agrees to do the business for him.

As to the boat that is to wait for them at a certain point near the Mole, Kirke Smith looks out for this. Perhaps he is not watched. At any rate, he finds a man whom he burs body and soul—this fel-

Thus Doctor Jack is fairly well satis over, when he meets Larry again; the latter is getting out of a cab at the door of the hotel and prosents a ridiculous appearance—his clothing dusty, his hat banged in, his face scratched, and the cripty rim of a once glorious eye-glass screwed into the cavity of his left optic and rat above all the save and structured at the save and structured.

As Doctor Jack surveys Cousin Larry from head to foot, he makes a mental calculation that if such a condition is significant of success heaven help the man who fails, for the dude is, indeed, an object for commiseration.

At the same time he catches an inflection under the tone of the other that tells him Larry has not been quite such a fool as outward circumstances would indicate.

She seemed dreadfully struck with his appearance, rather awed, Larry vowed, and Doctor Jack could easily believe it, since the dude in full dress was enough to fake any one's breath away. They chatted pleasantly, the senorita sang numerous songs, and with such warmth that Larry was in the seventh heaven of delight. He could not resist declaring his love for this beautiful creature, and on his knees proclaimed it. This produced a change; the Chilian beauty demanded that if he adored her he must prove the depth of his affection by renouncing the friendship of Doctor Jack and his wife and coming under her banner, when he would be permitted to worship—at a distance.

Larry's eyes were opened, and he saw the snare spread for his feet. It was not a part of his game to be tripped up. If given time he might have pretended to acquiesce in order to learn something of the plans of the rich Chilian beauty, but as he and his friends expected to sail in the morning this would not be profitable.

When it became evident that he was unwilling to obey her request, Marilla descended to threats. She found an obstinate little man in Larry Kennedy. Nothing could move him, and so another step was taken. ARGE & FRESH SUPPLY

The senorita clapped her hands and two native servants appeared, either of whom should have been able to have demolished the dude. These the infuriated woman set upon him much in the manner in which she might have urged a pack of hounds after game.

Larry groaned at his foolishness in coming without arms, but he was not the one to give in without a desperate struggle. They found the toughest little subject in the dude they had ever tackled.
