The Journal of Commerce, in an article on the subject, says:

The public schools were founded to teach the children of this city the plain radiments of an English education. A few years ago these were thought to be, and were, enough to fit the average child for the practical work of lile. It was deemed sufficient to drift the young mind thoroughly in spelling, reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic and geography. Upon these studies the teachers, efforts were all concentrated; and the schools of that period turned out pupils who had the solid groundwork of a good education. To this the ambittous student
