worthy motives? Senetimes an element of fraud may be found, but generally it is done out of supposed kindness. Men are neighbors and friends, and "What are friends for if not to help each other?" they say. The man who endorses feel, some he will never be called upon to pay the net and thinks as he is told that it is merely his name, as if his name and his property had no connection. Under the kind f cliuss produced by Christian influences each man thinks he ought to help every other man, and supposes of course that he is helping when he goes scurity for him. These loose views have the worst possible result. A man will endorse notes far in excess of what he is worth and so the coeditor less in the end as well.
