

Jeanmie Sinclair,

OR THE LILY OF THE STRATH.

CHAPTER VI.

SENSATION IN THE STRATH—THE BEAUTIFUL CHILD—ITS ADOPTION—RE-APPEARANCE OF WANDERING RED.

To these questions no answer could be had. An inscrutable mystery enshrouded the girl and all that belonged to her, and in that secluded and sequestered place no great means could be used to discover the truth.

The infant so cast among strangers was an object of unbounded admiration and deepest pity. It was a child of singular beauty, exceedingly fair in complexion, exquisitely formed, and of sweet temper.

It appeared likely, therefore, that the infant would fall into hands of the parish authorities, and be brought up at the parish expense, when, fortunately, a worthy couple stepped in, and saved it from this hapless fate.

Thomas Sinclair and his wife, Grizzy, occupied one of the best farms on the Baigley estate. Thomas did not only bear the name of the hereditary owners of that noble property, but he also claimed to be remotely connected with them by blood and lineage.

The strange event at the keeper's house had created a great interest at the home as well as elsewhere; and on the Sunday following its occurrence Thomas and Grizzy called in at Mrs. Lumsden's on their way from church to see the baby.

As they walked side by side towards their habitation, Grizzy was for a great part of the way unusually silent, and her husband did not seek to break in upon her meditation.

At length she spoke—

'Tammie, weel Grizza, lass, I ha'e been thinkin' I guessed as muckle, seein' that ye hinna opened yer mouth sin we left the toon. Is'tyon a bonny bairn? Deed is't—a rare bonny bairn. Man, Tammie, my heart was sair when I looked at it and thought that it had naebody tae care for it, an' I ha'e been thinkin'—

If a man wants a bottle of whiskey, let him buy it and take it home like a man, and not sneak home with a bottle of "Bitters" or "Cordial," and pretend that it is medicine.
