In another moment he was gone. She listened till she heard the front door close behind him, and then she gave way to her grief, flinging herself upon the sofa, covered her face with her hands and sobbed and moaned bitterly, weeping for the past, and laweeping, too, for the long desolate years that were to come. Poor woman, do not let us judge her too hardly, for whatever was the measure of her sin, it had assuredly found her out as our sins always do in the end. She had loved this man with a passion which has no parallel in the hearts of well ordered and well brought up women. She had never really lived till this fatal passion took possession of her, and now that its object had deserted her, her heart felt as though it had died within her. In that short half hour she suffered more than many woman do in their whole lives; but the paroxym passed, and she rose pale and trembling with set teet hand hlazing eves.

"He had better be careful," she said to herself; 'he may go, but if he tries to marry Ida I will keep my word; yes, for her sake

Ida I will keep 'my word; yes, for her sake as well as his."

When Edward Cossey came to consider the polition, which he did seriously on the following morning, he did not find it very satisfactory. To begin with, he was not altogether a heartless man, and such a scene as that which he had passed through on the previous evening was in itself quite enough to upset his nerves. At one time, at any rate, he had been much attached to Mrs. Quest; he had never borne her any violent affection—that had all been on her side; but still he had been fond of her, and if he could have done so, would probably have married her. Even now he was attached to her, and would have been glad to remain her triend would have been glad to remain her triend. her. Even now he was attached to her, and would have been glad to remain her friend if she would have allowed it. But then came the time when her heroics commenced to weary him, and he on his side began to fall in love with Ida de la Molle, and as he crew back so she came forward, till at length he was worn out, and things culminated as has been described. He was sorry for her, too, knowing how deeply she was attached to him, though it is probable that he did not in the least realize the extent to which she suffered, for neither men nor women who have intentionally or otherwise waich she suffered, for neither men nor wo-men who have intentionally or otherwise been the cause of intense mental anguish to one of the opposite sex ever do quite real-ize this. They, not unnaturally, measure the trouble by the depth of their own, and the trouble by the depth of their own, and are therefore very apt to come to erroneous conclusions. Of course, we are now speaking of cases where all the real passion is on one side, and indifference or comparative indifference on the other; for where it is mutual the grief will in natures of equal depth be mutual also.

At any rate, Edward Cossey was quite sensitive enough to feel the parting with Mrs. Quest acutely, and perhaps he felt the manner of it even more than the fact of the separation. Then came another consideration. He was, it is true, free from his entanglement, which was in itself an enormous relief, but the freedom was of a conditional nature. Belle had threatened trouble in the most decisive tones should he attempt to carry out his secret purpose, which she had not been slow to divine, of marrying Ida. From some occult reason, heard, to the effect that Col. Quaritch had been beforehand with him, had blown it into a flame. Ida was ever present in his thoughts, even at night he could not be rid of her, for, when he slept, her vision, dark eyed and beautiful, came stealing down his dreams. She was his heaven, and if by any ladder known to man he might climb thereto, thither he would climb. And so he set his teeth and vowed that, Mrs. Quest or no Mrs. Quest, he would set his fortune upon the hazzard of the die, ay, and win it, even if he loaded the diee.

the hazzard of the die, ay, and win it, even if he loaded the dice.

While he was still thinking thus, standing at the window and gazing out on to the market place of the quiet little town, he suddenly saw Ida herself driving up in her pony carriage. It was a wet and windy day, and the rain was on her check, and the wind tossed a little lock of brown hair. The cob was pulling, and her proud face was set as she concentrated her energies upon holding him. Never to Edward Cossey had she looked more beautiful. His heart beat fast at the sight of her, and whatever doubts may have lingered in his mind, vanished. Yes, he would claim her promise and marry her.

Presently the pony carriage pulled up at his door, and the boy who was sitting behind got down and rang the bell. He stepped back from the window, wondering what it could be.

"Will you please give that note to Mr. Cossey," said Ida, as the door opened, "and ask him to send an answer?" and she was gone.

Mrs. Maxweil Scott, the present owner of Abbotsford, long the residence of Scotland's great novelist and poet, Sir Walter Scott, has let it, along with the fishing and shooting, to a Liverpool gentleman for £200 a year. In the lease, however, she reserves to herself the right, during the tourist months, of throwing open to the public the library and four other rooms in which Sir Walter's books and personal relics are still kept. Admission is to be given on certain days of the week, and a small fee charged as usual. Last year these fees aggregated no less than £419, which shows that the great novelist's popularity at home and abroad is by no means on the wane.

PECULIAE PLACES FOR BIRDS' NESTS.

An English correspondent states: "A pair of robins have built a nest, in which there are now four eggs, on a shelf in the Boys' Board School, Poscastle. The shelf is only four feet from the ground and in full view of the scholars. One of the birds spent 2\frac{3}{2} hours in the nest one day recently during school hours."

In the village blacksmith shop at Audlem, Cheshire, Eng., hard by the blacksmith's bellows, a robin has built its nest on a ledge close to the spot where the horses are shod, and is now sitting upon its eggs. Neither the tremendous din of the hammers nor the flying sparks from the anvil appear to disturb the bird.
