

made it one of our first immortal three — Canada, Wolfe, and Montcalm.

This was the supreme glory of the name Montcalm; and a glory so bright that it shone even through the dust of death which shrouded the France of the Revolution. In 1790, when the National Assembly was suppressing the pensions granted by the crown, a special exception was made in favour of Montcalm's children. As kings, marquises, heirs, and pensions were the four things the Revolution hated most, it is a wonderful tribute to our Marquis of Montcalm that the revolutionary Parliament should have paid to his heirs the pension granted by a king. Nor has another century of change in France blotted out his name and fame. The Montcalm was the French flagship at the royal coronation naval review held in honour of King Edward VII, who did so much to make friends between the French and British. The Montcalm took the President of France to greet his ally the Czar of Russia. And, but for its duty elsewhere at the time, the Montcalm would have flown the French admiral's
