Whatever capability has appeared in women for success in those lines of life ormerly regarded as the field of male activity, the fact remains that life is divided broadly but imperatively into two leids—the domestic and the non-domestic and woman without het workings upon them of the other sphere in which they live. It is in the privacy and relaxation of home that all their finer parts are exercised and grow, faith, self-sacrifice, reverence, humility.

that all their finer parts are exercised and grow, faith, self-sacrifice, reverence, humility.

Women, at least a large portion of them, have never yet realized the overwhelming importance to the race of keeping their end of the log well up. God has not given the important work in the world to men and left women the fag ends. Indeed, except for the constant demonstration of the justice of God and the working of the "law of compensation," a thoughtful individual might be tempted to believe the reverse. The work of the home is not even supplementary. It is primary, the chief means in the hands of mankind to the regeneration of their fallen race. Men who live comparatively remote from the domestic, sphere have realized this most keenly? "The hand that rocks the cradic rules the world," has been confirmed by the race into a proverb. It was the wide-visioned Goethe who wrote the words which cling to our fancy with every strengthening conviction, "Die ewig welblich zieht uns hinan." But women have lived too close to the home life; they have experienced too little of the other side to feel the restless world's absolute need of home. And nineteenth century necessities and the nineteenth century spirit have turned them into fields of activity which could do quite well without them, at the expense of the homes of the world.

But the fact of the matter is that women will not engage in any profession that does not bring them appreciation of their efforts in some tangible form, and that is not publicly recognized as an honorable one. Housekeeping—home-keeping is a better word—has not been estimated at its proper value; far from it. It has hither to been looked upon as something that any woman can undertake when she falls at all else. No graver mistake was ever made, and that is not publicly recognized as an honorable one. The stories of the passengers who were saved add little that is new, except the belief that many women and children must have perished in the saloon, so sudden was the rush of water.

One of the rescued says that before the Stella sank she stood with her bows perpendicular for a moment, and then shot below like an arrow. All who were left on board were pitched sternward in a heap and disappeared with the ship.

"Four of the boats got away an right filled with men, women and children, with sailors to row them.

"As the sailors were getting out the port lifeboat the ship blew up and sank from sight almost immediately, carrying the captain and crew with it. I clambered on top of the keel of a capsized boat and was soon joined by nine others. Dozens or passengers and sailors were floating around the wreckage, making piteous appeals for help. But their cries soon ceased. Exhausted they sank to their watery graves.

Weather Cold, Sea Rough.

"Four strong swimmers now joined us on the upturned boat. It was bitterly cold, and the sea was rough and choppy. Finally a big wave righted the boat and all but two succeeded in scrambning into her. The boat soon filled to her gunwales, as her plug was out, and the waves washed in and out. She was kept affoat by her air tanks.

They were laid on like mosaic and blended with an instrument called a lestrum, the rounded part of which could be used to smoothe the colors over, as well as to mark the eyebrows, lips, etc. When the picture was finished it received its final smoothly the ball of the passengers died of exhaustion and was thrown overboard. "Then we got among the rocks in the terrible race current, finally drifting back toward the Casquet lights. The huge waves broke over us and constantly threatened to sweep us away. It was terrible. Soon a woman died, and we had to throw her rowing gave a gasp and fell dead. He, too, was pushed into the waves.

The racial types represented are mostly Greek, Greek-Egyptian and Semilic, the ages from 16 to 50. One theory advanced is that the portraits were first painted for the adorument of the home, and afterwards for that of the tomb. This idea is supported by the fact that many of them have holes pierced in them, by which they might have been hung: others have traces of cement or plaster from walls, from which they may have been taken. Was pushed into the waves.

Yelled in Vain for Help.

"We yelled at intervals all night to attract attention and help, but none came. At dawn a fireman died. Soon afterward we sighted Alderney, a mile away. Two steamers were close by. We put up our oars with handkerchiefs floating from the ends and signalled desperately for help. One of the vessels stopped an instant and then went on, disregarding our appeals.

"The body of the fireman washed about in the water in the boat in a gruesome manner for hours. Finally the sallors succeeded in heaving it out. Eight out of fourteen now remained alive.

"Another steamer soon hove in sight, but did not see our signals. Our boat drifted 20 miles in the open channel, until the coast of France came in view. A tug saw our signals of distress and picked us up at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon.

"We had had no food nor drink in 24 The Railway Magnate Has Secured our signais of distress and picked us up at 4 o'clock yesterday afternoon.

fax. He replied that he could not yet say whether the work would proceed, although several options had been secured. The proposed railway will extend from Port Hastings, on the Straits of Canso, northwards along the coast of Inverness County to Broad Cove, a distance of 58 miles, and if Mr. Mann takes hold of the work 33 miles of the line will have to be completed this year. The railway will pass through important coal deposits, the absence of harbors having prevented development before to-day. the German medical students against the admitting of women to the medical pro fession is becoming serious in some medica PHOTOGRAPHING THE STOMACH.

SORE ON THE WEATHER MAN.

The man who runs the weather in this town ought to be ashamed to look a woman in the face for many moons. The throwdown he gave to the fair sex yesterday was characteristic only of the mean villain at the matinee performance. For a week past there has been much anxiety among the ladies as to whether Easter Sunday would be a fine day or not. Although the weather man didn't promise much, he might have been charitable. Milliners had worked day and night all week on straw shapes, lace, ribbons, flowers, feathers and birds, shaping a little of each into bunches, artistic and otherwise, to be known as Easter hats

The dear girls who were fortunate enough to possess one of these frail structures of pretty things—and most of the Toronto girls had one—wanted a real nice spring day in order that they might don their handsome headgear and go forth to mingle with each other to throw sidelong glances at their reflections in the store-windows and to ease their saviety as dows and to ease their anxiety as what the other girls had got.

All this would have happened All this would have happened successfully but for the weather man—the lobster. What did he do? Why, instead of dishing out a nice new spring day, he provided not from his old stock, badly damaged and marked down to ninety-nine cents. An inserable mixture of raw cold and sunshine trimmed with a bleak wind, with small bunches of dust from the car tracks. Some of the dear girls went out and braved 't, but the saucy straw hats and their warm weather trimmings did not fit that weather. If The neat-fitting, light jackets (although no doubt reinforced by an extra walst underneath) looked a trifle previous. In some cases blue noses did not match red hats, but the girl wearing the fur ruff and the hat she bought at Christmas looked just about right.

The worst feature of the weather man' ungallant act is the fact that many feminine minds are left in a state of unrest The girls who wore their Easter hats do not know what kind of hats the other girl what kind the other girls have, and they now have the advantage of a week's tirue to beat them out.
