The destruction of trees by the electric The destruction of trees by the electric current is a matter of some moment just now. The question as to the right of telephone companies to cut the branches of trees which interfere with the string-ing of their wires has been taken into court, and the decisions vary in different states. In New York a recent decision was to the effect that the right of the companies to touch the trees must be justified by an existing necessity, and that no right exists to touch the trees unless extreme or extraordinary means must be employed to avoid the trees. If Michigan. however, the Supreme Court held recently that as poles must be set near the sides of the street or road, and as they are the street or road, and as they are nerally outside of the ditch or curb
