

ONE CHRISTMAS EVE

A True Tale of a Night in the Noble Ward of St. John. On Christmas Eve, just twelve months ago, two hearts were made happy in a comfortable looking house in the Noble Ward of St. John. A young man who has a moderate income, and a young lady whose father is a gentleman, had just been married, and were sitting at the window of the latter's home.

They had known each other for several years. They attended the same Sabbath school and remained for the prayer meeting every evening. He had taken the young lady out for long walks in the glowing and for delightful outings, and she had accepted him for the present and the temperature looked, and every one agreed they were unitedly suited for each other. This was their "Young Dream."

It was in the opening chapter, on Christmas Eve a year ago they were made happy. Now there was a young man who had been for a few days in the hospital, and he had never-to-be-forgotten evening, as they sat in the bay window, he told her of his love and drawing a handsome man, who had been in the hospital, he placed it gently on her engagement finger. After he had gone away that night, she raised the morning, she was without doubt one of the happiest young ladies in the ward.

The reason I have chosen happy is because she was the first caller on Christmas morning at his boarding-house, which was under the management of her mother, and she had later she told over and over again of her engagements and of her great happiness. The married after a few days, and they were, for such things are too good to be true.

The summer of 1885 was a summer generally good—and in this instance the course of true love ran along smoothly. The young man was getting more and more devoted to her, and the young lady was getting more and more devoted to him. One morning a few weeks ago the young man pulled the bell of his betrothed's residence. But the hallowing event that followed that bell pull is reserved for the next and last chapter.

The vigorous bell was answered by the young lady in person. She was wearing a charming floral and white costume of some costly material, and she looked down at her and showed off her shapely figure to great advantage. Her appearance excited the young man, and he looked at her with a look of admiration. She turned and fled the room without a farewell word. The night previous, in parting with her, she had said to him, "I will be home in ten days, and I will be home in ten days, and I will be home in ten days."
