Dear Mr. Meighen: I listened one night in January when it was really and truly 40 below, to your very charming and thoughtful contribution to that great mystery of literature "Shakespeare". I am one of those too who try to understand something of his supreme genius, and so I read his plays, and all the essays I can about him. My books are somewhat scattered at present, but I am hoping to get them together again and set up, but anyway I have a set of "Modern Eloquence", in which there is a masterly lecture on Shakespeare. I wonder if you have read it. But particularly I want to ask you if you have ever read a set of little books called "Weavers of Words, The Story of the World's Great Writers" by Henry Thomas Ph.D. I am sure you would be able to get ^{"Modern Eloquence"} in any library, and quite possibly you have it in your own, the set "Modern Eloquence" mentioned above, but you might not be able to get the one by
