

weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen: for the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal.'

So, though sorrowful, I could rejoice; for I had learned, like dear Little Pansy, to cast my burden upon the Lord, and had felt that He sustained me.

And as I have mentioned Little Pansy, I may add that I often thought of her, and that the remembrance of her, though it was partly painful, was yet very beneficial to me. I had not forgotten the month we spent together at the little watering-place, nor the knowledge which had come to me then of her youthful piety. I often wondered what had become of her, for I had never heard of her since our last parting. This is easily to be accounted for: the friendships and acquaintanceships formed at school do not often last far into life.

But, not to take up my reader's time with
