"Have you no relatives who would take them in for a time? Then the parish must provide for them. Do not be anxious on that score, the children will do well enough for a few days I will look after them.

"Never mind dear, we shall find it again. Now do not cry, this gentleman is going to take me to grandmother, and I hope we shall soon be back. No, you must not come too; when Charles comes home get the dinner ready for him, and do not forget to say grace as you always do."

"Then she kissed the child, and turned quickly to the door to hide the tears that started to her eyes. "I am ready now," she said to the policeman, on whom she had said and her whole manner had not failed to make a good impression.

"Hello!" exclaimed the boy, "what are you up to?" Mother was like a stone when she saw what you are doing. She is awfully strict about keeping her places in order; she rows with Julia and me if we do not put a hawk of wool out of its place."

"Are you Mrs. Jardiner's son?" inquired one of the agents. "I dare say you can help us. Do you know where the travelling bag is that grandmother brought home with her yesterday?"

"Uncle's bag do you mean? It is hanging up in the passage; Grandmother mended it last night."

"Where you had it when she unpacked it?"

"No, she unpacked it in her own room; I carried it upstairs for her."

"It was in it, was it not?"

"Pretty well, I could carry it easily."

"Was there not a good deal of money in it?"

"In the bag? I do not know. Grandmother said it was uncle's linen. But she did bring home a lot of money that Uncle gave her; he had it from a kind old lady. We were to pray for her."

"Where did you put the money? If you can tell me that, I will give you sixpence."

Before the lad could reply, the door of the parlor opened and Julia called to her brother: "Don't stand talking, Charles! They want to question everything out of us. They asked me ever so many questions, then they took mother away. But what a mess you are in! Your sleeve is all over mud, and there is a button torn off your jacket. Come here and let me brush you; you must have been fighting with your school fellows."

So saying, Julia drew her brother into the inner room and shut the door. Then she went on lowering her voice: "O, Charles, whatever it is to become of us! They have taken uncle away to prison, and they say he has committed some dreadful crime, and they have carried off grandmother and mother too. I think they have put her into prison as well, though mother said she was only going a little way, and would be back soon. I believe she only said that to me; I might not be vexed, else she would not have given me the key of the cupboard. Charles looked very much discontented, and while his sister was brushing the mud off his jacket, he said: "As I was coming home two of the boys called after me that uncle Francis stabbed a lady, and said I was the murderer's nephew, and everybody looked at me. But it is all a lie, is it not? Uncle would never do such a wicked thing."

"Of course it is all untrue, and I told the boys they were liars. Then one of them boxed my ears, but I got hold of him and punched him hard, only the other came up, and it was he who tore the button off my coat. Please sew another on for me, there are two in mother's workbasket. I wish I could pay that fellow out some time!"

"Poor uncle," said Julia, beginning to cry afresh. "I saw him; look, they had fastened his hands together like this, and his cassock was all muddy, and he was sitting in a cart beside a policeman. The people said he would be executed."

"No, Julia, I do not think so; don't cry. I remember reading a story about a miller, it was called 'Martin the Innocent.' He was put in prison because he was accused of murder, and was going to be hanged although quite innocent, but his children went on a pilgrimage and prayed for him, and his innocence was made clear. And he was let out of prison and had all sorts of honors paid him, and the judge who had condemned him wrongly gave him a present. Depend upon it, it will be just the same with uncle, he will be proved innocent and go back to Ste. Victoire with great honor. Nobody shall dare to call me a murderer's nephew again."

"How was the miller's innocence proved?" asked Julia.

But Julia deftly changed the conversation, and turned the boy's attention in another direction, by telling him how she had heard the police agent and the people in the street say that she and Charles would probably have to go to the workhouse. At this unexpected intelligence the little fellow let his knife and fork fall, and exclaimed: "What? We go to the workhouse? Never, never!"

"But if they take us there by force what can we do?" objected the sister. "I will run away. I know what I will do; I will go to Marcelles and be a cabin boy on a great ship that is going out to sea. And when we get to the island where there are savages and missionaries, I will leave the ship and be a missionary."

"You know you are a great deal too young for that. Besides, even if you could get employment on board a ship, what is to become of me?"

"You go to a convent," answered the boy in a very decided manner. A pause ensued, during which he again applied himself to the contents of his plate. When he had finished, he communicated the result of his reflections to his sister. "Look here, Julia," he said, "had we not better run away at once, before anyone proposes that we should go to the workhouse?"

Julia negated this proposal saying they must wait to see whether their mother came home. Then Charles thought of another alternative; he would go to his friend the baker, tell him what trouble they were in, and ask him for some money for their journey.

This was no sooner said than done. As soon as they had returned thanks the boy took his cap and ran off to the 'kind-hearted baker, whom he found encased in a comfortable arm-chair, smoking his pipe with a cup of coffee by his side. His wife, a good-natured little woman, sat opposite to him; of course the event of the day had been duly discussed by them, and both husband and wife were equally of the opinion that the priest was innocent of the crime laid to his charge. The only point on which they were not agreed, was whether the police authorities acted in good faith in arresting the clergyman and treating him as a criminal, or whether the whole affair was not a move on the part of the anti-clerical party, as the woman who could think no good of her political adversaries, firmly maintained. They were eager to hear all that the boy, who was a favorite with both of them, had to tell, and listened to his story with much interest.

Mr. Lenoir had not heard of the children's grandmother and mother being arrested, and he inquired all particulars. He shook his head gravely when the boy spoke of the lot of money, his grandmother had brought home with her, and the shade of suspicion as to the priest's innocence for the first time crossed his mind. However the worthy man took care to conceal his misgivings, for his wife would certainly have scolded him soundly had she known of them. As it was on hearing that the two women, whom she considered to be God-fearing and upright persons, were taken into custody, she burst into loud invectives against the police. And when Charles confided to her his apprehension in regard to the workhouse, she exclaimed: "No, indeed, they shall not take you there and perhaps make you lose your religion. Nothing of the sort. Andrew, let us take the children to me, as long as the authorities—(worse luck to them)—who let rogues go free and put honest folks into prison—keep the mother in detention. Put on your hat at once, and give notice that we will take charge of the poor children; God has not blessed us with a family of our own, and we want for nothing, let us at least prevent them from being corrupted in the workhouse. You will consent, will you not?"

The same idea struck Mr. Lenoir, at least in regard to his little friend Charles, so when his good wife made the suggestion, and at the close went through the formality of asking whether he was of the same mind as herself, he good-naturedly indicated his assent, adding, "that is if the children like to come."

Now Charles, young as he was, had the sense to see how much more desirable the proposal of the kind baker's wife was than the adventurous project he had formed for himself; he therefore hastened to accept it; and after partaking of a cup of coffee and sponge-cake, he set off with high glee to fetch his sister. Mr. Lenoir also got up from his arm-chair and repaired, attired in his best coat and hat, to the police station. The superintendent was very willing to give the children into his charge; but he considered it his duty to inform Mr. Lenoir that not only did the priest lay under the heaviest suspicion, on account of the strong circumstantial evidence against him, but his mother and sister were proved to have been receivers of the stolen property. "I tell you this," he concluded, "in case you may not wish to be mixed up with people of this class."

The worthy baker did in fact feel more inclined to revoke his decision; but he said to himself the children had done no wrong and nobody could blame him for an act of charity.

So he kept to his determination and that same evening both the children were received under his hospitable roof.

MISCELLANEOUS.
A SLIPPERY WARRIOR.
The plan of campaign which was to end the war in the Philippines has fallen of a part of its purpose. Three columns, numbering together some 12,000 men, were converged on Tarlac, which is or was Aguinaldo's capital. It was provided that the latter's headquarters and his few remaining adherents should be surrounded and either destroyed or captured. The movement was carried out successfully, the natives only making one serious stand, where they killed several American officers, including Major John A. Logan, son of General and Senator Logan, once candidate for the vice-presidency. Tarlac was seized, but Aguinaldo and his little army were not there. The Philippine chief is away among the mountains arranging for a continuance of the guerrilla war that he has conducted for the past year. The United States is conquering the Philippines in the same way that Spain put down the insurrection in Cuba, by winning every fight, and failing to hold the country occupied.

Two Warnings.
Losing flesh is one and a lack of ought is another. If they come together the warning is a loud and hard one. Scott's Emulsion does some of its best work in just these cases. It prevents consumption.
