CHAPTER XXXIII.

"I crave a boon!" Miss Craythorne said, with an effort at merriment. "Pray, Sir Charles, will you let me in, so that I may prefer my request with due solemnity before your gracious majesty!"

"Certainly," laughed Sir Charles. "I suppose you want some of my choicest books, or something to which the public has not access?"

He placed a chair for her and laid aside his cigar.

"No, no! Go on with your smoking!" commanded Ada. "I do not wish to ruffle your plumage, and I am fond of the odor of tobacco. Now, there's a confession for you! If you have put away your cigar, the very self-denial may affect your good temper, and at this moment I want you to be both lenient and generous."

"I could not be otherwise with you, Miss Craythorne," he said, earnestly. "There are few things that I would not do at your bidding, if I could help you."

She blushed rosily. He never remembered to have seen her blush so before. He hoped that she did not misconstrue his meaning. And there was still that happy, hopeful light in her eyes. He was puzzled more than he cared to own.

"I am smoking," he continued, "and listening."

"I hardly know how to begin," Ada smiled, "although I have fancied that it would be the easiest thing in the world to make my request, because it is to purchase for you something that is priceless."

"I am getting deeper into the mire," He laughed, shaking his head.

"Then I will speak out boldly, and beg of you, Sir Charles, not to judge me in any way, or even attempt to guess at my motives, until I give you permission." She spoke bravely now.

again, and I have given you proof of my statements here." She held a sealed envelope in her hand. "I shall have no reason to write to you now. All I ask is that to keep my secret for one week. At the end of that time you are at liberty to tell Sir Charles, and to marry him, if you can!"

The last words ended in a vicious little laugh, and with a mock courtesy, she turned abruptly, and Ada heard her quick steps descending the stairs.

When there was no doubt that Agnes Maitland was gone, Miss Craythorne read the contents of the paper which had been thrust into her hands.

This is what it contained:

I hereby declare when I was married to Sir Charles Hastings at the office of a Birmingham registrar, my first husband, Spiers, was then, and is now, living. I was married to Spiers 2 months prior to my marriage with Sir Charles Hastings, at St. Mark's Church, Clement Lane, London, W.C., and the ceremony, duly witnessed, will bear out the truth of this statement. Only one person, to my knowledge, except my husband and myself are aware of this, and that is Ebenezer Lupus, the lawyer. (signed) LUCY SPIERS (nee) LUCY RANKLIN.

Ada Craythorne read the precious lines over many times. There could be no doubt of their truth, and the man she loved was free!

Only one week, and she could place the written confession in his hands. Only one week, and he could meet her not merely as his mother's friend—but the woman whom he might honorably love before the whole world!

Oh! how sweet were these reflections—how immeasurably sweet! Today was the twenty-ninth of November. Ada had promised to return home on the fifth of December. She must stay until the sixth—she must keep with the woman known here as Agnes Maitland. Just stay until the sixth, and then give this precious slip of paper to Sir Charles, with her own hands. She would be the first to see his joy, and he would love her at that moment. He would forever associate her and her tireless love with his emancipation—with the snapping of a thralldom that was but a living death!
