How the British PHIPLES SPREAD Columbia Government

realized the full necessity of protect-ing the rights of the Indians and they intended to do so. They had not yet been officially notified of the negotia-tions of the British Columbia government with the red men, but before the surrender could be sanctioned it must been completed for an inquiry into the question of the British Columbia eserve. This matter would properly come under the scope of that commission and they would investigate it. He could assure the opposition that the government was clearly alive to its duty to protect the Indians and they would give the question every consideration. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that the premier's answer did not cover the case. He did not believe that a commission could properly deal with the matter. It was only appointed to cover the dispute as to the rights to the Indian land. Sir Wilfrid admitted that where the reserve lay close to a city it was desirable to remove it. The Indians were only an impediment to development but their rights must be protected. It seemed to him that the ndians had received an altogether inadequate amount for the reserve. Everything might be all right but the ought to be investigated be-surrender was finally con-

It was, he went on, probably by reason of the arrangement which the late Dominion government that Mr. Bowser had dealt with the matter so for each behad Mr. Bowser and to incorporate the harbor commissioners of Vancouver. Mr. Hazen briefly explained the features of the bill, pointing out that it is that Mr. Bowser had dealt with the matter so far as he had. Mr. Rogers then read telegrams exchanged in 1910 between Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Richard McBride, showing that Sir Wilfrid had stated that any arrangement satisfactory to the Indians would be satisfactory to the Dominion. The ment satisfactory to the Indians would be satisfactory to the Dominion. The late government, Mr. Rogers said, apcouncil. Hugh Guthrie, of South Welington, commended the course followed by Mr. Oliver in bringing the matter before the house. So much of a questionable nature on the part of the government had already been brought to light this session, he said, that it was wise that notice should be given to transactions such as that referred to by Mr. Oliver. In this connection Mr. Guthrie spoke of the case of the man Landry, who had been appointed to office by the government when a convicted criminal and had then been released by the government from jail. The defence set up for the government's course, he said had been appointed to office by the government from jail.
