Even in the shortest story, which hur-Even in the shortest story, which hurries itself along as fast as may be over a brief space of time, and yet endeavors to tell all things that need be known about everybody with whom it is concerned, there must be occasional intervals during which nothing happens, and about which there is absolutely nothing to tell—in which the streams of the lives of these with whom is deale does not of those with whom it deals does not blend, but flow in independent and paral-lel courses. So it was with Mr. Grode, so it was with Felicia, so with Arthur Cranstoun, so with Nathan Levi, during the few months that followed the de parture from her home of the secondnamed of these. Each lived his or her own life, and went on in his or her own way; and that is about all that can be said of any of them. But as no one can go on his own way without at last arriving somewhere, and as that some-where is all with which a short story

There is, then-to let these same few months drop unnoticed into the sea of oblivion—a certain part of Soho which is almost as much a French colony as Algiers itself. There the hungry man has to satisfy himself with strange ragouts of horsefiesh and beans, and the exhaust-ed to recruit his energies with absinthe, though within a stone's throw of roast beef and pale ale. The geography of this colony is a little arbitrary, for sometimes it has taken complete possession of one side of a street, without encroaching in the least upon the other; but to those who know the district, it is well marked enough. It is here that lodge by night those who by day are the habitues of Coventry street and the Quadrant; it is here that they hatch conspiracies as addled as the eggs whereof too often they have to make their omelettes aux fines herbes; and it is here that they get washed, to a too quickly evanescent whiteness, the scanty linen which has so much the air of having been born with

In one of these small streets, to which the possession of a "blanchisserie Fran-caise" gave quite an ill-deserved sugges-tion of superior cleanliness, with its snowy curtains and its prospect, through the ever-open door, of two or three rosy Norman faces in semi-Norman caps, whose owners were eternally engaged in whose owners were eternally engaged in crimping, clear-starching and chattering -if these are the proper technical terms to describe their occupation-were to be seen as many eccentric specimens of human nature as in any part of London. I do not mean the army of unhealthy gutter-children, or of other Arab tribes that make this street their playground and their home; these are not out of the common, heaven knows. I mean rather those who passed along it in the morning and evening on their way elsewhere; those who had to leave their country for their country's good or ill, as the case might be, and had found a refuse in Soho. The coaks and beards as the case might be, and had found a refuge in Soho. The coaks and beards and hats familiar to Bean street, and which passed unnoticed, were wholly unfamiliar elsewhere, and would have gathered starers in Mayfair and a mobin the Strand. But it is not with exiled patriots and swindlers that we have to do now. It is with a certain old-clothester when it is not with take the contraction of th man, who invariably took Bean street on his way to his daily business. He was a very old-clothesman of old-

He was a very old-clothesman of old-clothesmen, of a well known and his-torical type that has of late years been a little on the wane. He carried on his back the orthodox-black bag, and wore upon his head the orthodox three hats, if not more, while he was dressed in the greasiest, most incongruous, oldest clothes of all-greasy, incongruous and old beyond possibility of purchase or sale. Nor could one hear his cry with-out ascribing him at once to the ortho-dox and traditional nation of his calling. dox and traditional nation of his calling. But how he could find anyone to deal with him was almost inconceivable. He had simply the most hideous face in all London, and was deformed in body be-

On his first appearance in Bean street, On his first appearance in Bean street, he had created quite a sensation even there, accustomed as it was to strange appearances. A well-directed stone had struck off the topmost of his three hats, and he, in revenge, had caught hold, not of the offending urchin, but of a small boy who was gazing at him open-mouthed, and had given him such a thrashing with an old umbrella that "I'll give you to old Mo to put you in his bag!" became henceforth the best and surest way of stopping the crying of all the unruly babies within a mile. The hat itself had rolled to the door of the blanchisserie, where it was picked up by one of the girls—not, however, one of the rosy-faced Normandes, but by a young fellowgirls—not, however, one of the rosy-faced Normandes, but by a young fellow-workwoman of theirs, who handed it to its owner quietly, and without any outward symptom of disgust or fear. He, however, did not even say "Thank you," but scowled fiercely at her and passed on. The next day he passed the blanchisserie again, and passed also the same young girl, who was entering the door at the moment, so closely that she, being engaged in wool-gathering, just brushed him inadvertently with her dress. She recognized him—how, indeed, could she help it?—and instinctively wished him "Good morning" as he went on his way.

Perhaps had he been a young and good-looking fellow, he would have had to wait a great many mornings for the salutation; but, being as he was, the bestowal of two kind words upon him was something in the nature of a charity; and, although he did not appear to have heard them, they could not have been disagreeable to one whom nature and poverty must have rendered singularly inexperienced in pleasant greetings. Perhaps, however, he may have had a suspicion that it was his nature and his poverty that had gained him this: and, if he did think so, he was not far wrong. There is many a tender-hearted Perhaps had he been a young and good-

There is many a tender-hearted girl who bestows her best caresses upon her ugliest and cheapest doll; many a mother who shows most affection for her worst-favored child, simply because it is cheapest, ugitest, or worst-favored: and such caresses are, therefore, not complimentary to the object of them. The next day, this girl, who must surely in her childhood have singled out some preposterously hideous doll for her especial favorite, was working with her needle as he passed the door ing with her needle as he passed the door. Her companions, with looks of disgust, pointed him out to each other as they would have pointed out a toad. But she, doubtless for that very reason, frankly greeted him with a real smile. Doubtless she felt, unconsciously, as some tender-hearted girls will, that it is just the toads and spiders that stand most in need of their smiles: that if God, for some mys-terious reason, had thought fit to curse this man, it was not for her to turn aside with loathing from what God had done. There are some whose natural mission it is to deal out kind looks and kind words to those whom others scorn; and theirs to those whom others scorn; and theirs is a ninth Beatitude. But this, though the most remarkable event in it, was by no means the whole of his day. He found some customers, though not many: he had not to draw upon his purse very largely to invest in the cast-off garments that it was his business to sell again. And, when he did draw upon his purse, it was with un-willingness written in every crook of his crooked fingers. He looked at both sides of a shilling, he even felt round the edge before he laid it down; and if one shill-ing happened to be ever so little thinner than another, it was the thicker of the than another, it was the thicker of the two that he took, with the thinner that he paid. Before sunset—it was the eve of the Sabbath—he turned homewards. He had not tasted food all day; but, though his belly was empty of all but gnawing pains, a more contented look began to pass over his face, and his hands relaxed their clutch a little as he came in sight of his hands—a wrethed. came in sight of his home—a wretched-looking slop-shop in a street of Soho to which Bean street was a quarter of pal-Every street has some other to which itself is aristocratic; perhaps there is even some worse street than this, though even in the back slums of Lambeth or of Westminster it would be hard to find. Still, home—so they say, at beth or of Westminster it would be hard to find. Still, home-so they say, at least-is always home. Perhaps even he had some heart—though it must have been a strange one—to which even such a form as his was dear: a mother, perhaps, or a sister, with whom he was about to spend a Sabbath of sympathy. But, in spite of the look of pleased anticipation that his features strove to wear, no voice greeted him as he entered the darkness of his shop. He put up the shutters, sighed the sigh of relief that is drawn by a man who hates his toil when his day of toil is over at last, and then his day of toil is over at last, and then set to work to devour hungrily some strange-looking food that he took from a musty and mouse-eaten cupboard. It a musty and mouse-eaten cupboard. It is not so that men feed, however poor they may be, who do not live alone. Then he washed himself after a fashion, went into a wretched rat-run back room, with a single blindless window that looked out into a small, blind court heaped up with dust and offal, and with no furniture save a rasged mattress and the remnant of an offer stool, took a key from his breast tocket, and set down his candle upon the floor. It was a wax candle, by the way, of the very best quality—altogether out of keeping with quality-altogether out of keeping with the place and with the man.

BASEBALL. EASTERN LEAGUE OFFICERS. New York, Dec. 6.—The Eastern League magnates completed their two days' session last night, and at the conclusion of the session the majority of the minor league solons left the city. At yesterday's meeting it was decided to begin the season on Thursday, May 1. The schedule will consist of 126 games, and the season will close about Sept. 20. The umpire question will be left to the rules committee of the National Association of Professional Baseball Leagues for decision. The Eastern League people howsion. The Eastern League people, how-ever, especially President Powers, will advocates giving the master of play in-creased power. President Powers believes creased power. President Powers believes that the umpire should be absolute while on the field, and his decisions never questioned. He is anxious to have a resolution passed by the National Association to this effect. He thinks this is the only possible solution of the rowdy ball question. The project of raising a sinking fund in the Eastern League was laid over until the annual spring meeting, as was the matter of dividing the gate receipts on a percentage basis, instead of having on a percentage basis, instead of having arantee among the clubs WESTERN LEAGUE UNCHANGED. St. Joseph, Mo., Dec. 16.—The Western League has decided to retain its organization practically the same as last year. The annual meeting ratified the old organization, and accepted the resignations of President Hickey, George Tebeau, of Kansas City, and George Lennon, of St. Paul.

NICHOLS AT KANSAS CITY. Kansas City, Mo., Dec. 6.—Charles (Kid) Nichols, of the Boston National League team, will be associated with James Manning in the control of the Kansas City club next year, as the franchise was granted to them jointly. Nichols, whose home is in this city, says he has promised Boston the first chance on his services, but that he would seek honorable release from his old club, with every hope of success. BILLIARDS.

SLOSSON DEFEATS HOWISON. New York, Dec. 6.—In the international championship billiard tournament last night, the game between Slosson and Howison was won by the New Yorker by a score of 400 to the Canadian's 206. In the afternoon Ora C. Morningstar, of Rochester, Ind., defeated George Sutton, of Chicago, 400 to 375.
