

WITHOUT A HOME.

By Edward P. Roe, Author of "Barriers Broken", "Avenue", "Opening a Chequer Book", "Gleanings from Small Farms", etc., etc.

"Where have you been to-night?" he asked bluntly. Roger told him. "Where were you last night and this morning?" Roger briefly narrated the whole story, concluding, "It's the first time I've been late to business since."

The old man listened grimly, without interruption, and then said, "Of course I'm glad you got the girl off, but it's bad management to get mixed up in such scrapes. Perhaps a little insight into court-room scenes will do you no harm since you are to be a lawyer. Now that the affair is over, however, I wish you to drop these Jockeys. They are of no advantage to you, and they belong to a class that is exceedingly disagreeable to me. I suppose you know what kind of a man Mr. Jockey is?"

"Yes, sir; but you do not know what kind of a woman Mrs. Jockey is. She is—"

"She is Jockey's wife, isn't she?" "Certainly; but—"

"And the girl is his daughter. They live in a dandy tenement, and are as poor as crows."

"Misfortune and the wrong of others might make all this true of us," began the youth impatiently; "and yet if old friends should turn their backs—"

"You are not an old friend," his uncle again interrupted, in his hard, business-like tones. "They are merely accidental acquaintances, who happened to board at your father's house last summer. They haven't the ghost of a claim upon you."

"I look far more as if you were in love with the girl, and were making a romantic fool of yourself."

Roger's face grew very white, but he controlled himself, and asked, "Uncle, have I ever treated you with disrespect?"

"Certainly not. Why should you?" "With some right I may also ask why you treat me with such disrespect?"

The old man opened his eyes, and was somewhat taken aback by this unexpected question, and yet a moment's reflection showed him that he had given cause for it. He also remembered his nephew, and remembered, with a short conciliatory laugh, "I guess I'm the fool, to be imagining all this nonsense. Of course you are too much of an Atwood to entangle yourself with such people and spoil your prospects for life."

Look here, Roger. I'll be frank with you, and then we'll understand each other. You know I've neither child nor child, and I've turned a good big penny in business. When you first came I thought you were a rattled country boy that wanted a lark in the city, and I took you more to keep you out of mischief than for any other cause."

Well, I've been watching you closely and I was mistaken. You've got the stuff in you to make a man, and I see no reason why you should not be the best of the best before you reach my years, and I mean to give you a chance. You've got a little soft place in your head and heart, and I mean to get it out of you."

"I am glad to hear you say that—I'm glad to be remembered," he said, with a smile. "Well, my promise has already been given. I have promised that poor broken-hearted woman, Mrs. Jockey, that I'd try to help her through her difficulties. I've promised her daughter, Belle, that I'd give her a brother's care and affection."
