Meanwhile Max still adored Miss Flora Alibi; he was her shadow as long as his new gloves lasted. He met her "by chance" every day while his boots were mew, and he vanished from her sight when mid quarterly shabbiness overcame him. At last his emotions overcame his common sense, and being all alone in the drawing-room with his angel, he dropped on one knee at her feet and told her that he adored her; and she gave a little sob, and room with his angel, he dropped on one hnee at her feet and told her that he adored her; and she gave a little sob, and turned her face from him; and he caught her hand and kissed it, and in a moment more had kissed her lips, and it was done. Whatever happened afterward, Max never could forget that blissful moment. Soon they sat together on the sofa and talked more quietly, and she promised to 'waii for him forever," and was so sure of his coming fame and fortune that he grew sure of it also; and but one thing more remained—the speaking to Mr. Alibi. That Max dreaded, and with rea-son. When he did speak, that worthy gentleman listened in amazement, and proceeded forthwith to browbeat and cross-question him, as thorigh he had been in the w tness box. In the end he proved to him, on his own showing, that he was too poor to marry, and had no prospects what-ever; and ended by assuring him that the idea was out of question.
