character of the Southern and the disunited character of the Northern people, till a large portion of the British public, statesmen in cluded, had actually begun to consider the establishment of a slaveholding empire as an indubitable fact, and the wreck and ruin of indubitable fact, and the wreck and rain of the great Republic as little else than question of time. Need we say how this is now all changed? And need we ask why it is all changed? The American papers and people themselves see it as well as we do people themselves see it as well as we do and estimate it, too, at its real value.— They have begun to expose "the unprincipled and hypocritical journalism of Great Britain;" and can we blame them, knowing as we do how much they have and how much they can quote to justify the severes They see as well as we do that it is success ot prisciple that is worshipped by the lead Press organs of our country; that so soon as success can be seen to be assured, no matter though it be that of a Coup d'etat to strangle liberty in France, or that of a four years' struggle to establish freedom in America, or that of a Palmerston deliberate America, or that of a rainterston denterate ly scoffing and sneering at the very cause under pledge of faithfulness to which he got a renewed lease of power, or that of a Colenso assailing and undermining the fortresses of the Church the true interests of which he d taken solemn oath to vindicate and serve, the congratulations are the same.— They see also much more than this, as we too, do; and again, we ask, can we blame them when we know how British opinion is from time to time prostituted for the purposes of party or the exigencies of faction.

The New and how in the great struggle now coming to a close our noble country has by its position been made to suffer a humiliation indered and the back of the sla oken, and when, over and above indignation has been profoundly ex-by one of the most diabolical acts history has ever recorded, in the nation of the noblest of rulers and for certain journals and certain men, unde enied that slavery was the cause and oin of the war, and that, as Britons, we origin of the war, and that, as Britons, we are bound to give our sympathy to those who are struggling to put so great an abomination down. They would not make these admissions when they were needed to guard the country from deception and from crime; they make them now when the truth has become clear as noonday to every man com-petent to grasp facts and form an opinion to demonstrate that leopards cannot change their spots nor Ethiopians their skin, how-ever for a while both may by circumstances appear to be transformed or "clothed upon," see how in the House of Lords Earl Russell sentiments he expressed when he thought tried to leave the impression that slavery had nothing to do with the war, going even so far as to represent President Lincoln as having given expression to an opinion which he never uttered, either in essence or sub-stance, and which he never could have utter-ed in terms of the Constitution it was his storing the republic to its pristine prosperi-ty." See also how Lord Derby, to the confusion of his aristocratic and republic-hating friends, disported his false logic in arguing that there has been no unfriendly feeling in this country to America, because all sections and classes are now crying out against a dastardly assassination. See too, against a dastardly assassination. See too, how without the slightest evidence in his favour, and much against him, he assumes that his "chivalry" could not have had a hand in the reseasing tion. hand in the assassination. See, again, how he speaks of "the bold, manly, and forbear-ing course the Confederates have adopted in ing course the Confederates have adopted in struggling for everything dear to them;" and see, finally, how, as if to torture Earl Russell, who found it convenient not again even his own organs have deemed it their interest to forget, he declares the North ting for empire and the South for like these, under the pretence of good feeling and generous sympathy, make honest men blush here, and cannot deceive those on the other side of the Atlantic. They are false to history and to fact; they are opposed to common sense; they are in bad taste; and as such they must be condemned.

While we cannot help thus expressing ourselves amid prevailing hypocrisy and sham we are, nevertheless, quite prepared to believe that a marvellous change has some over the spirit of great Britain within the past few weeks, and more especially since the brutal murder of President Lincoln and the attempted assassination of Mr. Seward and his sons. We never had a dentity that the great his honest heart of
