THE WAR.
[From the Times.]

The question which presses most urgently on the consideration of the British and French governments, and upon the gallant officers of both nations who command the forces by sea and land, is what naval or military undertaking is best calculated to accomplish the objects of the war. The two great nations of the west which have taken up arms in this quarrel have a right to anticipate results conformable to the magnitude of these operations; and, without pretending to penetrate that secrecy which must be maintained as to the operations of war in which we may engage, it is open to all the world to discuss the course of action most likely to effect our purpose. The uncertainty which hangs over the movements of the Russian army at the time when the allied forces left the harbours of England and France, rendered it impossible to frame a complete scheme of operations at the commencement of the war. If the Russian army had advanced with as much energy as might have been anticipated from its former military reputation, if Omar Pasha had not succeeded in halting the line of the Danube from Kalafat to Silistria with the courage and tenacity which the Turks have shown in all their encounters with the enemy, the first duty of the allied army would have been to strengthen the position of Turkey, to cover Constantinople, and to hold the Balkans and the fortress on the coast. But it is clear from each succeeding account that the war is already losing its offensive character on the side of Russia, and its defensive system of operations is therefore required. If our object is not merely to rescue Turkey from her invasion, but to preserve her from future aggression. At the same time it cannot be the intention of the allied commanders to carry their operations into Moldavia, where the Russians are already watched by a powerful Austrian army, and still less to pursue them in the event of a retreat across the plains of Rumania. The operations of the fleets have been necessarily of a defensive character and limited effort, for we have to deal with an enemy who has not ventured to show his flag upon the waters since the declaration of war. The evacuation of the whole Circassian coast is a highly satisfactory result of Admiral Lyons' cruise, and the conduct of the steam squadron under Admiral Kable, the only fleet which offered any resistance, was most judicious. But no very important political results can be expected from the defeat of the Russians along a mountainous coast which they have never held in complete subjection, and we must look elsewhere for the means of striking the Russian empire and its policy in a more vulnerable part. The key to the supremacy which Russia has acquired during the last century over the Black Sea and its coast lies in the possession of the Crimea. Barely 150 years have elapsed since she first entered that peninsula, only 80 years since Catherine completed the conquest, and since the annexation of the Crimea, and to close the Circassian coast—enabling the Russian fleet to occupy the mouths of the Danube, and sheltering their immense fleets in the Bosphorus, and to close the Straits of the Bosphorus. As long as Russia has the Crimea, with Sebastopol for her stronghold and her naval arsenal, all these advantages are hers. It is impossible that the States bordering on the other shores of the Black Sea should oppose an effectual resistance to such an unassailable position, and the maritime Powers themselves cannot permanently maintain a fleet of 15 sail of the line to watch Sebastopol. The great political and military objects of the war cannot therefore be attained as long as Sebastopol and the Russian fleet are in existence; but if that central position of the Russian power in the South of the empire were annihilated, the whole fabric which has cost the Czar of Russia a century to raise falls to the ground. We hold, therefore, that the taking of Sebastopol and the occupation of the Crimea are objects which would repay all the cost of the present war, and would permanently settle in our favor the principal questions now in dispute; and it is equally clear that these objects are to be accomplished by no other means, for a peace which should leave Russia in possession of the same means of aggression would only enable her to recommence the war at her pleasure. The Crimea is on many accounts favourable to the operations of the allied armies, supported by the fleets. The climate of the southern coast is said to be healthy, while that of the northern portion of the peninsula is marshy and pestiferous. The coast itself is indented by numerous bays, and that of Kaffa or Theodosia, on the south-eastern point of the country, is large enough to admit a fleet, and to serve as the base of operations for an army. When recently visited by Sir E. Lyons and the steam squadron, the forts and defenses of this place were observed to be quite inconsiderable. Access to every part of the coast would, of course, be easy for the conveyance of supplies, reinforcements, and even the heavy train of the army. The Russians, on the contrary, would have to bring the whole of their troops and supplies to the seat of war across the immense steeps of the mountainous provinces of the empire. Nicholas and Chernomir could be blockaded so as to stop all communication by water, and, if Sebastopol were invested by sea and land, Russia has no other place of strength in the country to fall back upon. The conduct of a siege is an affair of art, which must be successful in a given time, unless the besiegers relieve the place in the interval by defeating the besieging army or by compelling it to retire. From the best accounts which have been obtained of Sebastopol there is no reason to suppose that the land defenses of the place are of a very formidable character, or that much has been done to them until the present hostilities gave the Emperor reason to apprehend an attack by European armies. The position of the town upon a cliff rising from the sea commands a great extent of the prodigious straits which have been erected for the protection of the harbour, and their fire would probably not touch operations commenced in the rear of the place and on higher ground. We cannot, therefore, but suppose that 20,000 men of the allied armies, supported by the fleets, would be able to keep in check any number of troops Russia can throw into the Crimea, and we are confirmed in hoping that this is the operation resolved upon by the allied governments, by the fact that very heavy batteries of guns have been despatched from England, English and French armaments. In fact, however, breaching batteries of ordnance far above the ordinary calibre might easily be constructed with gun-lashed from the ships, which have an overwhelming superiority of metal, and could furnish a battering train of extraordinary power. The next movements of the Russian army on the Danube and the fate of Silistria, upon the arrival of the allied troops at Varna, will determine whether Prince Gortschakoff or Marshal St. Armand is to remain the offensive. If the Russians are actually prepared to advance upon Belgrade, which does not appear to be the case, the primary object of the campaign is the destruction of the army of invasion; but if, as the last accounts would lead us to believe, the demonstration of Austria is already compelling Prince Fulkvitch to fall back on the Sereth and the Pruth, the most effectual blow that can be aimed at Russia, and the most powerful diversion in favour of our several allies, is that which should crown the present campaign by the fall of Sebastopol, and we trust that no time will be lost in undertaking an expedition which would be so useful to our policy and so glorious to our arms.

Sir JOHN FRANKLIN.—The names of the other crew of the Erebus and Terror, contrary to the notice given by the Admiralty, are still retained in the "Navy List;" and will remain there until the return of the searching ships. This change may be in some measure due to Lady Franklin, who has addressed a long and eloquent protest to the Admiralty against the removal of her husband's name from the Admiralty's book until all search for him terminates. With unextinguished hope she still declares that it appears to her reasonable that Sir John Franklin and his companions should not be considered dead, but living, and hence her exertions to the Admiralty's instructions for him to follow, and also her later effect on these grounds.—1. Because no evidence has been discovered of any catastrophe having befallen them. 2. Because the quarter of the Arctic Sea where it is most probable that the missing parties would be found living, or their fate ascertained, has never yet, so far as we know, been explored.—Sir E. Belcher, when last heard of, having advanced only to the verge of the open sea to the north-west but without entering it; and because the part thus indicated is one of the two corners pointed out to my husband in the Admiralty's instructions for him to follow, and also because it has been pronounced, after a thorough examination of the other course, that he could not have passed that way. 3. Because within this unexamined region the resources for supporting life are probably abundant;—and 4. Because my husband and his officers readily contemplated, and from the first provided for, a detention extending over an indefinite period, should difficulties occur to prevent their return at the time expected.

HOW TO KNOW WHETHER A MAN BELONGS TO HEAVEN OR NOT.—It was wont to be a trial, whether land belonged to England or Ireland by putting in toads, or snakes, or any other venomous creature into it; and if they lived there, it was concluded that the land belonged to England; if they died, to Ireland. So if venomous lusts live in us, if sin reign in our mortal bodies, we belong to hell; but if they die by mortification, if there be no life in them, then shall we be sure to set up our eternal rest in heaven; and to be made heirs of heaven, and have full possession of those mansions Christ, our elder brother, hath prepared for us.

What men want is not talent, it is judgment; in other words, not the power to achieve, but the will to labor.
