The Demise of Willie's Brother

Willie was an office boy, Willie was a fan;
Willie knew more about baseball
Than many an older man. Willie said his brother
Was sick as man could be,
And "Please could he get off today To bear him companee?"

You may," the Boss said, gently, Gazing at Willie the while,
And Wilie's look as he stood there
Was wholly free from guile.
His head bowed low with sorrow,
He slowly went outside,
While gloop have gloom hung over the office. And the secretary cried.

Next day he showed up at the office, Next day he showed up at the orne With a frown as black as night; The Boss, with kindly manner, Inquired if all was not tright. "Not on your life!" said Willie, Forgeting himself in his rage.
Which was rather improper of Willie,
Considering he wasn't of age.

"Oh, tell me, Willie, tell me,"
The gentle Boss then cried;
"Your brother—is he safe at home?
Or has the poor chap died?"
"I should say he wasn't safe at home! (There was venom in every word), "In the end of the ninth—de score a tie-The sucker DIED AT THIRD!"

MADE FAMOUS BY HIS SQUAT

When you see Catcher Jimmy Archer, the star Cub performer, you see a wonderful workman. Archer is the boy picked up by Frank Chance after Hugh Jennings turned him down because he did not like his style of throwing. This year, however, Jennings has a recruit backstop who throws from the wrist with the same motion used by Archer.

Archer's squat throw made him famous. He gets the ball down to second while squatting on his heels, saving the time lost by most catchers in straightening up to get power. The photographer snapped Archer on the job in his characteristic crouch.
