WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 21st, 1898. gans of the temperance party have not dealt harder blows to the liquor traffic. The question about to be submitted to a vote of the Canadian people is a momentum. the Canadian people is a momentous one, greater than is contained in any political creed, and one that is so far working the inside painting in the Ruggles block. the whole world will be interested in the re sult. The Witness has editorially summarized the situation as below, and the case is so clearly put that we copy the article as a help to a good cause. and what is the objector doing about it? We shall probably never reach the ideal either in earth or heaven. When the time comes that we have no conception of anything higher than we have already realized the joy of hope and, we should imagine, the joy of existence will have ended. When we have no transcendent ideals we shall have forsaken that which is divine in us, and shall not the way of the Anglo-Saxon to do noth great many who have not awakened to the idea that the opportunity to vote for or against the legalizing of the liquor traffic imposes any duty upon themselves.

-Mr. John Brown, of Lawrencetown, has a Gravenstein apple tree that blossomed last spring and was afterwards dug up and reset in another part of the field. It is now in full bloom again and has also full grown fruit on its branches. prople do not think for a moment what they are saying; their attitude is nonsensical. There will not be any law if those who approve of prohibition act as they are doing, but there certainly will be one if there is a sufficiently clear expression of public opinion on its behalf. Grant that the government people do not think for a moment what they but there certainly will be one if there is a sufficiently clear expression of public opinion on its behalf. Grant that the government is as opposed to it as its opponents say it is, it dare not refuse to carry out a plain mandate of the people. If no law results it will be the direct result of the course of those who would like to see prohibition, but do not take any trouble to secure it. But even if there was not going to be any law, there would still be as much reason for earnest activity as if there was; indeed, more. The forces that are really important are the moral forces. It is a less matter what laws we have than it is what convictions we have; speaking now, not of those cohvictions which we think we hold, but of those by which we have think we hold, but of those by which we would see the second are the convictions with the sufficiency of the sufficient of the convictions with the sufficiency of the sufficient of the convictions with the sufficient of the convictions with the sufficient of the convictions which we think we hold, but of those by which we will be called to the pastorate of the speedy mare formerly owned by the Results of the Baptist of the correct of publication of the sufficient of the suffic we think we hold, but of those by which we live. The less formed are the convictions of the people in favor of driving the drink traffic from the land the more need there is of taking advantage of the moment when the public mind is awake to the question to win as many as possible to the side of patricism. Every vote cast for prohibition will the effect of this order will be to dot the town with cesspools, which will not only constitute a heavy charge to those who are compelled to construct them, but the expense will be for temporary work. When the day for an adequate sewage system comes, these property owners will have to discard their cesspools and connect with the proper sewer, and thus will have been saddled with two taxes in developing a better. A complete sewage system for the town would entail a heavy expenditure, and is perhaps too much to expect for some years yet, but we believe that a partial system could be laid in the central portions of the town at a cost that would not terrify the average ratepayer. The work done on such a sewer need not be wasted as the branch could be incorporated at any time with a more complete system. It would be cheaper by far in the long run, and would more effectively serve the end in view. The public propose of the race except the winner.

The happy couple left on the Eluenose, more complete system. It would be cheaper by far in the long run, and would more effectively serve the end in view. The public welfare demands that measures be adopted to correct a condition that, in the event of the outbreak of any deadly epidemic disease, would be a fearful ally in propogating the deadly germs, and it is incumbent upon curcivic rulers to move in the matter without any unnecessary delay. The people of the town recognize the danger; realize that it can hardly be corrected by individual effort, and since the danger is so apparent, expect a radical reform to be inaugurated by the Town Council, who may depend upon a full and hearty support in carrying out any wise plan for the betterment of our drainage system. There are some who will approve of the cesspool remedy, but the majority of the townspeople, we are sure, regard this as a shortsighted attempt at reform, and one the cesspool remedy, but the majority of the townspeople, we are sure, regard this as a shortsighted attempt at reform, and one liable to meet with strenuous objections from the property owners who will be directly affected. One branch of sewer has been successfully laid in town, and another of equal extent would be of more benefit than all the cesspools that the resolution of the Council will cause to be constructed, and the taxpayers will not gramble at the expense.

Every vote cast for prohibition will be a moral force going to the forming of public conviction on the right side. With the average man no argument is stronger than what his fellow men think. Every vote cast against prohibition will help to lower public sentiment, and every vote not cast will help to chill public sentiment. Better almost a live public sentiment on the wrong side than one frozen to death and un touched by those interests which appeal to the public conscience most acutely and to its sympathies most besechingly."

—The Town Council has taken a step towards remedying the dangerous and offensive sanitary condition that prevails throughout a considerable portion of the town, but whether the step taken was or was not a wise one is an open question. The resoultion passed by the Council requires that all property owners who drain into open gutters, shall construct proper cesspools, and discontinue the use of said gutters. Now the effect of this order will be to dot the town with cesspools, which will not only constitute a heavy charge to those who are the work of the regiment of the strong side than one frozen to death and uncouncied by those interests which appeal to a Yarmouth man.
