at games, who talk of having servants when they have none, who without authority read other people's letters, and who listen to conversations not intended for their ears.

Girls, she said, were more prone to cheat at games than boys. This was owing to be chivalrous and tolerant toward girls, and girls consequently grew up expecting tolerance of boys and were thereby handicapped. Women did not learn the practical lessons which rough experience gave men. A boy knew that if he did not play did not get that useful experience. A boy learned to abide by an umpire's decision. A girl would appeal from such a decision if she did not like it. Girls generally had more sense of honor by nature, and boys canvass a man named Axtell.
