Thine eyes were filled with softened light, But welcome now I read,
As to my heart, by love's foud sight, I gen'ly drew thy head:

And oh! so cloquent were they,—
So full of earnest truth,—
I knew what fain thy heart would say,
The promise of thy youth.

I knew that theu hadst faithful been To vows of long ago; That speeding time, and changing scene, No change in thee could show. That absence had but bound thy love More firmly to its choice—
It needed not one word to prove,
One sound of thy loved voice.

Yes! stient was that long embrace,
Though tears flowed fast and free,
As gazing down in that dear face,
I read thy love for me;
And thought of all the lonely hours When I had wildly yearned To press thee thus unto my heart, And feel my kiss returned.

Those midnight hours! by sea and land! How heavily they sped! Sometimes upon a surf-beat strand My weary feet would tread;
And when the stars looked calmly down
From cloudless foreign skies—
Their soft light seemed a radiance thrown From these pure, earnest eyes.

Twas but a dream ! the light breeze swept Soft toucless o'er my brow;
The spray's cold kiss my lips had met,
Oh, still afar art thou!
'Twas but a dream! and yet I heard Thy murmured-" Art throu come !"
