Whom the Gods Would Destroy.

(Wall Street Journal.)

Has the White House utterly lost all sense of proportion, to say nothing of all sense of humor? Does "quem deus vult perdere prius dementat" actually apply? Or is it that Mr. Wilson's apologists are incurably silly? His faithful supporter, the New York World, publishes on its front page an explanation of why the British Ambassador, Lord Grey, was not allowed to present his credentials to the President when others, including the Prince of Wales, were received.

The explanation given is that an attache of the previous British Embassy, Lord Reading's military secretary, on at least one occasion, a dinner, allowed himself to speak in comment and ridicule of the White House "family." This comment is said to have beeen conveyed, by two women, to the Person most concerned. It was then seriously submitted to the State Department and, by it, to Lord Reading. An apology or explanation from the indiscreet British officer was accepted by Mr. Lansing. The officer subsequently returned to Europe in the

It is further alleged, by the When boiling fish lay it on a piece same authority, that this is the realand without making the President's acquaintance, and why he subsequently embarrassed the President of the United States by what appeared, to the rest of us, an honest attempt to tell his own people something about the American Constitution. If this is so truth is stronger than fiction. As a matter of fact history proves that it is. Frederick the Great once ventured, in mixed company, some rankling comment upon Madame de Pompadour. She, or officially Louis XIV. resented the gratiutous fling, and the consequence was that France went to war on the side of Prussia's enemies. Both Catherine of Russia and Maria Theresa of Austria considered personal remarks a cause of war. But Frederick was an absolute monarch and they were queens. For the sake of common decency it is to be hoped that the President will immediately do something to muzzle his friends. He has adopted a tone of absolution which requires all sorts of dignity to make itself effective. Now, least of all times, can he afford to be made ridiculous.
