Center people having secured him for Friday, Dec. 14. The Toronto Mail has the following to say of his engagement in that city: The executive of the Festival Chorus have engaged for their "Messiah" performance one of the foremost exponents of oratorio now in England, in the baritone Mr. Watkin Milis, who took so prominent a part at the recent Birmingham Musical Festival, under the direction of Dr. Hans Richter. Mr. Watkin Mills first made his appearance in America in May last, when he came over expressly from England to sing at the Cincinnati, Springfield and Indianapolis festivals. His success was so emphatic that Walter Damrosch, of New York, and the Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, have prevailed upon him to again cross the Atlantic to sing in the "Messiah" in New York and Boston during Christmas week. The Cincinnati Tribune, commenting upon Mr. Mills' work at the May festival, dated the 23rd of that month, 1894, says of the "Elijah" performance: "The palm of the evening undoubtedly belongs to Mr. Wilkin Mills, not because he had the most important task, but because he accomplished it with such great excellence. One could not ask for a more scholarly or a more beautiful interpretation of the part of Elijah. His conception was full of dignity and reverence. He seemed to be constantly mindful of the lofty, heroic character of the prophet, and he gave the recitative, which is among the most wonderful features of the oratorio, as one truly speaking from God. It is rare to find a baritone voice so marvelously well equipped by nature for such a task, combining as he does, so many qualities-roundness, depth, smoothness and flexibility." THE ILL-FATED EXPEDITION LEAVES THE ARCTIC REGIONS.

Dangerous Journey to and From Walden Island, Where the Ragnvald Jarl Was Wrecked-A Fishing Sloop Conveys the Party to Tromsoe.

WALDEN ISLAND, July 22 .- At last we have returned to the scene of the wreck of the Ragnvald Jarl. Once more, after two months of wandering upon the ice, we are able to sleep in a house and in something that resembles a bed, for here the crew of the Jarl have built a very substantial hut out of the timbers of the wreck, and have furnished it with bunks and bedding. Our journey hither from Cape Whitney was full of toil and peril. The ice was rotten, or it was rough, or it was full of treacherous tidal cracks and holes. Poor Mr. Alme we had to carry all the way, lying in one of the boats, with his injured leg incased in plaster bandages. He suffered no pain, thanks to Dr. Mohun's skill, but it was hard for him to add his weight to our burden and to lie all day with his pipe in his mouth watching his companions pull and

Our last day's journey was a race for life. Between our camp and our goal the ice, though filled with innumerable water holes, was in fair condition, but the wind was in the north and the terrible pack outside was slowly breaking up the smooth ice and threatening to engulf whoever Rev. Dr. Jackson, pastor of the First should chance to be traveling its surface. Congregational Church, Kingston, has reran together, as piece lapped upon piece under the influence of the majestic pressure, gave us warning that we had no time to lose. We knew too well what those serpentlike sounds portended. But cross we must, and we decided to do so at once and as rapidly as possible. Under the conditions of the road we expected to use two days for the passage, but when we had once started it became evident that if we wished to cross within a week and without a terrible struggle for life in the breaking mass we must keep on. Fortunately the water pools were longer than those we had formerly traversed, and we were therefore able to make better speed. For the first time since we have had to drag Mr. Alme we took both boats at a single trip, six men on one boat and five to the other.

WADING THE FRESH WATER POOLS. Spurred on by the danger, every man put forth all his strength. Now and then three or four of us were down in the sea up to our necks at the same time, having rushed upon rotten ice in our haste. It is not a pleasant sensation, this of feeling your feet go down toward China beneath you, and right glad a man is under such circumstances to have a boat to cling to. Often our water pools were very deep, especially at their edges, and we had to stand in water up to our armpits and lift the boats out upon the dry ice. It was late in the evening when we approached the shores of Walden Island through a wide water hole. Two men and a dog came running down to meet us, and as we paddled the boats through sludge they ran along the edge of the fast ice and shouted out their welcome and the news of their arctic St. Helena. Captain Bottelfsen and four men had started nearly a month ago for Dane's Island and Norway in the little Kane. Every one was well at the island. There had been no open water, and of course no hunting vessels within sight from the mountain top, and the poor old Ragnvald Jarl had remained affoat. literally held up by the ice which destroyed her, for a period of ten days after the

One after another of the seven inhabitants of the island came running down to meet us. We were astonished at their appearance and they at ours; so white, clean and newly shaven, so neatly attired, were they in comparison with our tanned, dirty and bedraggled selves. As the officers of the expedition clambered over the rocks and approached the house built of timbers from the ill-fated ship—the Hotel White Bear, the men had named it-a salute was fired from the mountain in our honor.

Aug. 3.-We leave Walden Island in a few hours, and do so without regret. It is a very comfortable resort but the winter will soon be coming on, and a wintering here means that when spring comes our bones will be found bleaching on the rocks. The Hotel White Bear has been a snug resting place for two weeks-two weeks of weary waiting for a chance to get away. Though the wind was for many days strong in the ratt quarter, the stubborn ice would never nove. It began to be a serious question whether it ever would move. Until some change in the situation showed itself escape was impossible, for between us and the main land was a six-mile belt of impassable ice. Through it we might have struggled with our aluminium boats, but not all of the party of nineteen could go in these craft in the event of coming to open water, and such a thing as leaving the men of the Jarl behind was not to be thought of. Night and day we kept watch upon the mountain, determined to use the first opportunity to get away, even a poor one. We had food enough for sixty days, but if winter should catch us here-well, it would be a cold and hungry winter.

The Hotel White Bear really consists of a single room 20 by 24 feet, but in one corner is a little apartment for the four officers. Here we have the cabin of the Jarl reproduced, with tables and chairs and beds and even the pictures on the wall. Here we sleep and have our meals. It is like being civilized again, for we have our trunks, rescued in a more or less damaged condition from the hold of the ship, and are able to shave and wear silken pajamas and bathe in toilet water, and could, if occasion arose, don our dress suits and patent leathers and go to the party. Better still, we have a lot of books, chiefly about arctic expeditions, most of them even more luckless than our own, and as we read we wondered why arctic expeditions never do have any luck anyway. Our greatest enjoyment is eating. We eat and sleep and play whist and read and talk and watch the ice, but our principal avocation is eating. Plum duff is luxurious, and we eat so much that it occasionally makes some of the men ill. But they eat none the less at the next meal on that account. At last we think we have a chance to get away. The strait between our prison and the mainland is half open. There is much floating ice as the tide and the wind move it to and fro, and it will be rather ticklish

Though our return has been rapid it was not altogether an easy task. For three days we had a pretty hard time in the drifting ice, beset by dangers and compelled to struggle from one point of vantage to another. Our sharpest work was crossing the strait, and having once gained the mainland we felt ourselves masters of the situation. Along the coast of Northeast Land we found some open water and were glad to discover the seaworthiness and sailing qualities of our aluminium boats. In choppy seas they behaved admirably and against adverse breezes sailed almost up to the eye of the wind. On our way along the shore we camped one night at a spot which bore marks of having been also the camp of Captain Bottelfsen and his brave companions, who had dared the dangers of the Arctic Sea in a boat 14 feet long and 41-2

On our fourth day out we came to an open sea, and at Low Island found a number of Norwegian hunting sloops working their way northward as the ice slowly receded, looking for seal and walrus. One of these brought us a letter from Captain Bottelfsen, which told briefly of his struggles to reach Dane's Island and of his determination to go on to Norway as soon as possible and execute our order for another ship to come out and take us back. But the date of the letter was only two weeks earlier, and it really appeared that with haste and good luck we might reach Norway before he could hire his ship and start on the return voyage. Though we were quite able to take care of ourselves down the coast to headquarters and were rather enjoying the trip, we decided to hire the fast sloop Berentine, Captain Nils Johnson, and go on without delay. The Berentine proved a fast sailer, and luckily we had a fair wind, so that in two days we came to anchor before our headquarters house in the Dane's Gat. Right glad were Professor Oven and Mr. Heyerdahl to see us, as well as three sailor boys who had sought refuge there when their own ship, the Malygen, sailed off to Norway with Captain Bottelfsen without them. They were in no danger of being compelled to winter, for Bottelfsen was coming back, and, besides, all the hunting ships would be sure to call before returning to Norway. If forced to winter, they would have had everything a man could wish for except daylight and the morning paper, for their comfortable house was literally full of the best provisions. Taking these stores and the men aboard, we set sail for Tromsoe. Calms and adverse winds delayed us en route, and it was with great regret we learned, when near this port, that Captain Bottelfsen had but four days before sailed for Spitzbergen in the Malygen, being towed out of the fiord by the kindness of Captain Wempe, of the German steamer Stet-

TYNWALD HILL. during the preceding year. Tynwald Hill, at St. John's, is a small mound of earth, about twelve feet high and eighty in circumference at the base, consisting of four circular platforms, ascended by steps cut in the earth. The ceremony, which takes place on the mound, is precisely the same as that conducted in 1417. All the most important officials of the island, from the Governor, the Deemsters and downward, take part in the proceedings, and the picturesque effect is greatly heightened by the presence of the military, who, like the officials, are in full uniform. The earth of which the Tynwald Hill is formed is said to have been brought from each of the seventeen parishes into which the island is divided.
