Good Health

The most precious heritage which ature can bestow upon any one ome keen observer of life has re marked, is that of a sound mind in a sound body. It is not so utterly true that you cannot have a sound mind without a sound body, for many a great mind has been but poorly equipped physically, but it is almost so. The fine body does almost everything for the fine mind, from keeping it cheerful to giving it energy and the power of creation; and the fine mind gives the fine body its raiment and food-all the joys, in short, of which it is capable

But how little the average person knows what it means to have a fine body! We are almost all of us born with some defect. There is scarcely a human being who has not some inherent weakness or ailment which he cannot help. At the same time there are very few who have not some ill or ills which they could get rid of if they wanted to. The pains that follow in the wake of wretched teethhow easily they could be avoided! it could be modified! Your lung specialist knows how easy it would be for the average man to avoid the agony and terror which follow upon consumption. And as for eye doctors: they will all tell you that the average human being has not the slight-
