ave Bri-e to our our our REFLECTIONS on the Rife, Progrefs, and probable Confequences, of the prefent Contentions with the Colonies.

§ 1. HAD authority determined me which fide to take in the important queftion, how the mother country ought to conduct herfelf towards the colonies, I would have embraced thefe fentiments in favours of administration, which happen to be popular and fashionable with the greater part of my neighbours, my nearest relations, my most intimate friends, and the gentlemen with whom I generally think and act in other matters. But no authority, however respectable, can be pled against reason. No names or numbers will warrant my ascribing justice or wifdom to meafures, in which my understanding thinks it difcerns the reverfe .-- A fair state of the grounds of my opinion will fatisfy the impartial. that I have not formed it rashly : and may furnish many of my countrymen who with to judge candidly, with fome not unufeful information, fcattered in books, pamphlets, and periodical publications which they have not opportunity or leifure to perufe, as to the fentiments of the Colonists, their manner of pleading their own caufe, and the regard due to fome of the'r pleas

§ 2. One chief circumstance, that hath reconciled a great part of the nation to war with the colonies, is, an apprehension that there was a general defire in them of independence on the mother country. Their extensive territory, wholesome and temperate climate, luxuriant and fertile foil, rapid population, commodious ports, and variety of products, united many of their friends and enemies in the idea that North America would one day become the feat of a flourishing empire. It is not improbable that, in fome future period, this would have hap- $\Lambda$  pened:
