THE METAMORPHOSIS OF KATHARINE.

By HARRIET LUMMIS SMITH.

Outwardly there had been little to distinguish it from the ordinary summer flirtation, but in his heart Dorchester knew a difference. He was aware that moonlight and music in combination had led many a man into difficulties, and that the syphilis-like girl in white who clung to your arm as you strolled along the beach after dinner, frequently seems quite another being from the sunburned young creature with an inflated nose, who sits opposite you at breakfast. Accordingly, Dorchester told himself to "go slow," but at the same time he knew that his friendship with Katharine Elmslie was in a class by itself.

First of all, he was keenly alive to Katharine's uniqueness to the other girls of his acquaintance. This opinion, so original and startling in a lover, was almost justified by the facts in the case. The pliant prettiness of the girl's face, which had at first attracted him, was almost forgotten in the new charms which unfolded as their acquaintance progressed. Katharine could talk nonsense between dances with delightful abandon; when a man was not in the mood for nonsense, she could meet him on his own ground. Grave or gay, by turns, equally ready for a game of golf, a flirtation, or an economic discussion, she seemed half-a-dozen girls in one; and Dorchester did not know which of the six was the most charming.

Dorchester had a prejudice against seaside engagements. "If she cares enough about me to marry me," he reasoned, "she'll wait six weeks. And, at the end of that time, I feel as if I do now, by Jove, I won't wait a day longer." By dint of almost super-human self-control, he got through their last evening together without committing himself, and in the morning, when he took Katharine to the train, he asked her for her address in the city.

The girl did not answer with her usual frankness, nor did her eyes meet his. "I'm going to be on the wire for a while," she said cautiously. "I'll send you a line when I'm settled again."

"But you'll let me write to you, won't you?" asked Dorchester, dismayed. This was something he had not counted on.

"I shall be too busy to answer any letters," answered Miss Elmslie, with decision. "Wait till you hear from me."

Dorchester felt so ill-used that he took refuge in aggrieved silence, and repented only as he watched the vanishing train which whisked Katharine from his sight. "I should have insisted on a promise to write," he thought. "I should have refused to submit to anything so preposterous." But the mischief was done, and the only thing left was to wait with what grace he could muster for the promised letter.

In the months that followed Dorchester experienced every imaginable form of resentment over Katharine's silence. At first he was only pale and abstracted, and jumped nervously at the sound of the postman's ring. Then he reached the cynical stage, and spent his leisure composing stinging epigrams on feminine heartlessness; following that, he plunged into desperate flirtations with half of the girls of his acquaintance, and when the rejected came refused all invitations and abused society. And so the winter wore away, and the coming of spring found his pygmy passion grown to full stature. As he had strolled with Katharine on the shore, he had not known how much the charm of the moment was due to the moonlight, and how much to the magic of her eyes. Was it the touch of her hand that quickened his pulse, or the sound of distant music and the sighing of the sea? He had doubted then; but he doubted no longer. He told himself bitterly that he was a craven who had lost paradise by his indecision.

He met Claudia Ward at the entrance of the park one afternoon in April, and sauntered by her side along the path bordered by elms, their branches tossing riotously, drunken with new sap. The steaming fog sent up its incense, and the crocuses were in bloom. For the time being, Dorchester lost the realization that life was a failure, and felt distinctly pleasurable to have a pretty girl at his elbow, sweet and sympathetic and anxious to please.

Hurry's The Word If You Want To Share In The Bargains at Oak Hall During Their Great Mid-Summer Sale

The Great Sale of Men's and Boys' Clothing and Furnishings has created the greatest interest and enthusiasm among the people of St. John. Each day has added to the sale. But Saturday at one o'clock when the store closes for the day this sale will have ended. It's the biggest chance to get correct clothes and furnishings at big savings you've had in a long time, and it will be your loss if you fail to profit by it.
