"Keep's good weath r-helm, my lad," said he to the sailor on the upper side of the wheel; "a point higher, if you can, quartermater," he then stepped towards the veteran master, who had immediate care of the navigation. "Well, Mr. Jones," said Captain Grove cheerfully, "we shall do yet, I think, if we only keep our own for an hour longer at this rate. We must get to windward a little more though, for a devit of a seezer this gale looks to turn out before midnight. "How far off the tend do you make her now, Mr. Jones ?" asked the commander, pointing to the chart.
"Why," replied the master, holding it towards the lantern, although it flapped and struggled as he did so, "by dead reckoning since noon, ser, about fity miles east by south of Cape Sparty rento, which'll set us somewhere nigh hans eighty annohirty miles south-east and by south of Cape Carbonnyraw, sir."

"That won't do with this stiff gale," said the captain; "and with what we may have beforelong! We must certainly weather the cape a good deal clearer than that, Junes. Mr. Abbot," continued he, addressing the bluff, like first lieutenant, who had just appeared on teck, "you will see the yards braced sharper up, if you please, sir, immediately; and make her course for the next two hours as wastly cast by-north as you can."

"Just so, sir," replied the first lieutenant with respectful alacrity; and as soon as the change had teen effected, Captain tirove prepared to go below, his mind now in a great measure at rest. The old master looked again at his chart, fidgeted, and then approached his superior by the after-hatchway, wearing an expression of considerable uneasiness. "But Captain Grove," said he, hesitating,
"there's one thing, eit, in that case—why?"——

"Well, what is it, Mr. Jones ?" said the captain, turnis gere he should descend; pray make that though."

"Why, sir, if I'm right in my reckoning at all," continued Mr. Jdnes, "that very same course 'll
