The Canadians fought as men angered by losses, and they bombed out the enemy with fierce detemination to get back the lost ground at any cost.
Further details have not yet come down from that scene of battle, ing the Canadians launched a counter-attack and gained a lodgment at several places in the trenches occufighting.

Heavy Enemy Losses
So far, it is clear that the enemy's attack was not the beginning of that Thiri Battle of Ypres, which always haunts the imagination of people at home. It has not yet developed into the first serious of the serious o ing that the enemy concentrated their artillery fire upon the sector. They used guns of every calibre, and rot only poured high explosives and shrapnel upon the front line treaches, but put up a formidable barrage behind, and shelled the roads in the neighborhood in a systematic way.

Our artillery retaliated and one of the greatest duels of gun-fire that has been seen on our front for some time lasted for several hours.
