(H. F. BHC ARTICLE)

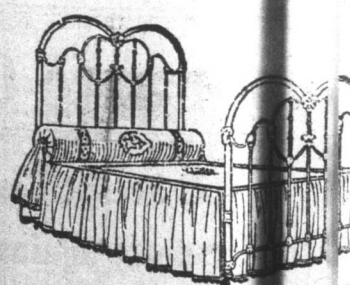

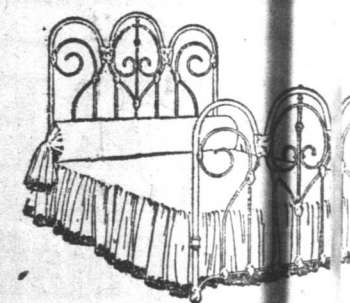

To those of your readers, fishermen and merchants particularly, there is a sentence in Mr. Kelson's letter (Article XI) which most certainly have caught their eyes, and given them a subject for deep thought, viz: "I am sure the quality of the fish shipped by the John and Elizabeth. I am sure the fisherman, an enterprising business manager of the great firm of Saine Johnston & Co., W. B. Grier, Esq., with nearly half a century of experience behind him as well as the interest and subject of an ordinary contrast with the existing state of affairs (in some instances) at the present day. I refer to the following words in Mr. Kelson's letter to Mr. Slade: "I hope you will dispatch one of the larger ones (vessels) pretty early for fear the John and Elizabeth might not return in time, as present cargo being of such quality, as not to offer the least risk in remaining on board for six months." It goes to show how careful they were in purchasing the fish, and how they expressed upon the fishermen through their agents, that nothing but a first-class article would be received, and the fishermen recognizing this established rule, took every care to turn out their voyage in conformity with the instructions. You will also notice in previous letters how he dwelt upon the absolute necessity of Mr. Slade purchasing nothing but the best quality of salt, and how often he rebuked Josh Curl "over the knuckles" for permitting himself to be taken in on a few occasions by having an inferior article passed over to him by the dealers. It is clearly evident that in those far-off days there was no complaint about the fish being discolored to pink, because the fishermen were well aware that if they did not take any care and precaution to ship well-made fish their product would not be accepted as merchantable, and thus they would lose considerably at the winding up of the voyage.

Historians Astray.

In all my reading of the works and writings of the so-called historians, they, one and all, assert that the highest price for fish ever given in this country was in 1814, when it fetched
