their journey threw them together; but Fernandes for once seemed unable to put any constraint upon himself or else did not care to exercise it. He mounted silently and rode off with Aranda, leaving Derwent to follow with the mozos.

As they passed down the canada, the young man turned in his saddle and looked back at the majestic peak the first appearsnee of which had so fascinated him. It tormed a beautiful picture for his parting glance, standing in stately isolation at the dead of the gorge, its noble summit bathed in golden sunshine, while the purple shadows of late afternoon had gathered in the deep chasms around its base. Knowing just where to look, his eye caught the light gleam of the great lode running across the mighty slope; and with a pang of disappintment keener than he had reckoned upon, he bade adieu to the hopes which it had kindled.

Since there was anyly an hour or two of the stimulant, and then asked him feel very faint. He lay down obediently, and the stranger began to cut away the clothing from his wound in a very practiced manner. He muttered as every comments in Spanish when he saw the wound; but he bandaged is skillfully, administered to Derwent another dose of the stimulant, and then asked him him how he had been shot.

Since there was only an hour or two of daylight remaining, they made as much haste as possible out of the barranca, and then, turning from the direct road, took their way to a ranch on the slope of the mountains, where Senor Aranda had made arrangements for them to spend the night.

The next morning Fernandez proved to be in the same mood as on the preceeding evening, saying only such few words as were necessary for interpretation and direction; so Derwent, as he swung himself into his saddle, thought without much cheerfulness of the long, silent ride before him, for they hoped to make Eitzatlan by night. But the ride was not destined to be so silent as he had anticipated. But the ride was not destined to be so silent as he had anticipated. Fernandez came to his side, and, observing that they had both been somewhat hasty the day before, purposed to explain fully the whole history of the bond. It would have been a brutal incivility, of which Derwent was incapable, to tell the man that he distrusted his statements altogether; so he listened to a sketch of Barrera's impracticable and fiery disposition, of the desire of the other owners to sell the mine, of the the other owners to sell the mine, of the difficulty they had in inducing him to consent to a sale, and of the manner in which he had since endeavored to embarrass their eflorts. On abstract grounds Derwent agreed that it was hard that one man should have power to annoy others and injure their interests; but he said to himself that he was by no means sure on which side the injury lay, and he altogether declined to reconsider his own decision. The result was finally the exchange of a few angry words which cut deeply on each side, and then the two men parted, Fertew angry words which cut deeply on each side, and then the two men parted, Ferhandez to join Senor Aranda, and Derwent to soothe himself with a cigar alone.

At noon they haited, for a short rest and refreshment by the side of the only water on their road. They were in the midst of a very wild and desolate country, surrounded by mountains, with a savage-looking defile before them, through which their road, lay, "What an inviting place for brigands!" thought Derwent, regarding the narrow pass and frowning heights. But, knowing how sternly this little amusement had been put down in the country, he had no apprehensions of anything of the kind. The thought was merely suggested by the recollection of the many bloody deeds which such localities had witnessed in times past. It was not even strong tion. W. T. Strong, ISI Dundas street, agent, it is past. It was not even strong enough to deter him, a little later, from lalling behind the rest of the party, as hey passed down a barranca with a steep nountain strewn with rocks on one side and a precipice which dropped two thousand feet deep on the other. The road at this point descended so sharply that Derwent, to relieve himself as well as his mule, dismounted and walked, with the animal following loose behind him. It was a daugerous place, for the almost precipitous incline of the road was strewn with fragments of boulders from the mountain above, and his attention was altogether fixed upon ments of boulders from the mountain above; and his attention was altogether fixed upon the path, when the sudden falling of a rock immediately before him caused him to look quickly up the mountain-side.
