The German ambassador, De Radowitz, urged His Majesty to issue his edict promptly, pointing out that prompt action would be regarded by Abbas and his supporters with favor, whereas delay would alienate and provoke the young man, who, sustained by the British, would inevitably become ruler of Egypt. The Sultan listened to this advice and issued the edict so suddenly that the opposition was taken by surprise. The French endeavored to cover their surprise by President Carnot's message to the Sultan. It uppears the young Khedive had been warned from Vienna and London to avoid Stamboul, and that was the reason that he took passage by the way of Trieste. He, himself, is said to have expressed the determination, on hearing of his father's death, not to fall like his grandfather into the hands of the Porte.
