and other famous explorers who have risked their lives in searching the mysteries of that quarter of the globe.

Pinto was at that date an officer in the service of his native country, Portugal, and had for some years been employed in the Portuguese colomies of Western Africa. His expedition was fitted out conjointly by his government and the Lisbon Geographical Society. It occupied 16 months. On his return to Lisbon he was we ceived with evidences of great esteem by the King and was the object of popular adulation in all quarters. In a series of public lectures and in an extended published journal of his lravels he described the many strange and interesting places and scenes he had encountered in his arduous and dangerous journey, and he brought home large and valuable collections of plant and animal life. He described the sources of four great rivers here-tofore unknown. His discovery of the River Joando, navigable for 600 miles and flowing into the Zambesi, alone placed Major Pinto in the rank of the great African explorers. His escort on this long and hazardous journers was economical danger on the proper to a tribe to a tribe to a ribe.
