FANCY VERSUS JUDGMENT.

There are students who, in their intellectual work, exercise more what we may call the fancy than the other powers of the mind. More or less contemptuous as to their class manuals and their class tasks, they engage in a number of minor, but more attractive, investigations. None, apparently, are more busy, and more studious, and none bear more jauntily the self-awarded diplomas of a vast erudition. Yet the show of learning will not bear close inspection. No crop can be gathered where there is no proper tilling, seeding and cultivation of the ground. Students make a mistake when they hurry through their exercises without revising them; when they merely glance here and there at the few pages of a book which they are preparing for lecture; when, in the lecture-room, they give themselves to vague revery instead of being alert and attentive to
