

Clash action

Censor board offended by stark reality.

Joe .Strummer's rotted teeth symbolize this Clash documentary by Director Jack Hazan (A Bigger Splash). It captures in close-up England's punksters, The Clash City Rockers on an exhausting fight-filled tour. It's perfect for the Clash-starved fan.

Hazan's camera, like John Cassavetes', follows his characters with voyeuristic abandon and so we see a gritty picture of the jaded punk rock scene in England. We get scenes like the one pictured; breathing authentic moments. Or we would, if they hadn't got lost crossing the Ontario border.

The Clash have disowned the film claiming it's boring. After the Clash action all we get are dozens of cutaways to a leaching would-be roadie, who can't figure out why The Clash mix politics and rock: "Joe, what does R.A.F. mean?"

In a recent interview Joe Strummer said he thinks a Clash break-up is imminent. They have already completed a song book of good songs and performed blistering concerts that got better as the tours multiplied. This glimpse barely captures the spark of The Clash. It's a film to be seen, but not really enjoyed.
