Rheumatism

Rheumatism is a deep seated, dangerous disease, caused by the absorption into the blood of effete refuse matter, which should be carried out of the system through the proper channels. This poison soon destroys the purity of the blood and as it circulates through the body the acid particles that are thrown off penetrate the nerves, muscles, membranes and even the bones. In Acute Articular Rheomatism, the affection usually commences suddenly; sometimes pain or success in the joints precedes the disclosure of the disclose. The joints become wollen, particularly the see of the Rnee, ankle, wrist, elbow and the smaller joints of the hands and feet. Acute Rheumatism is always identified with more or less feverish condition and profuse perspiration, especially at neight, same being strongly acid, showing the system is attempting to throw off the poisonous parti-cles. Chronic Rheumatism is the same as the acute form, but milder and less extended; through strange to say, more persistent and difficult through strange to say, more persistent and difficult Lecture. Moscular Rheumatism also exists under two forms, acute and chronic, the latter as in Articular Rheumatism, not so vadent in attack but pittless in its hold on the system. In the acute form, there is first a dull pain in the muscles, which gradually increases, growing almost inbearably vio-lent in movements which require the contraction of the moscles. In the chronic form, pain is excited only when the affected muscles are contracted with unusual force, and is more apt to change its location than in the acute form. With the blood in an unhealthy condition, exposure to cold, combined with moisture, the night air, sudden changes in the weather, sleeping between damp sheets, sitting in a cold, damp room, especially when heated from exercise, or an acute attack of indigestion is sufficient to bring on an at-tack of Rhemmatism, in those who have never before experi-enced the difficulty, and cause violent attacks in those who are subject to it.
