THE BEST SIX BOOKS.

WHICH ARE THE WORKS THAT WOULD FILL THIS PRESCRIPTION?

Professor Harry Thurston Peck's Selection of This Interesting Limited Library Problem From Five Different Points of View.

I have been requested to answer the following inquiry, which comes from a clergyman in Fayetteville, N. C., who writes Professor Harry Thurston Peck, editor of The Bookman, in the New York Journal:

"What are the best six books, supposing that an intelligent and fairly educated person could have but six books?" This limitation in the number of books makes the selection difficult because the list is not intended for some particular individual whose tastes and interests one is supposed to be familiar with, but a list which one could confidently recommend to any person whatever who is "intelligent and fairly educated." What, then, are the best six books?

If we take very high ground in this matter and select the six books which have in all probability done the most to influence human thought and, therefore, human action throughout the centuries and of which the power seems destined to endure, the task of selection, perhaps, is not so very difficult.

In choosing them, however, one must obviously restrict himself to those books which have had the greatest effect upon western civilization, excluding those which belong altogether, or nearly so, to the east. Thus, the sayings of Confucius and the sacred books of India, while they are of immense interest and importance, lie outside the concern of an occidental reader.

So, too, the Koran, in spite of all that it means to the millions who still follow the teachings of the prophet, has no appropriate place here. The following are, I think, the books which, in one way or another, have most profoundly affected the development of western civilization in its different phases:

1. The Bible. 2. Homer's "Odyssey." 3. Aristotle's "Ethics and Politics." 4. Bacon's "Novum Organum." 5. Rousseau's "Social and Political Treatises." 6. Darwin's "Origin of Species."

In the foregoing list I fancy that nothing requires explanation, except perhaps, Homer's "Odyssey." Many persons would say at once that the "Odyssey" hardly deserves inclusion in such a list, since from the point of literature alone it is supposed to be inferior to the "Iliad," while from any other point of view it would seem to be altogether out of place.

These assertions, however, would be incorrect. In the first place, the "Odyssey" is in reality a finer piece of literature than the "Iliad," and, in the second place, from rather than from the "Iliad" comes the great stream of literary and semipolitical tradition which is traceable in Virgil and the later Latin poets, in Dante, in Spenser and in Milton.

The six books named above, however, represent a sort of council of perfection. They are the most remarkable six books that can be gathered together. Yet I doubt whether any person, if he were restricted to six books for the rest of his life, would wish the six just named. I know, for one, that I should not.

To make any other list, however, is like firing a gun in the dark or like prescribing for a patient whom you have never seen. You may possibly hit the target with the gun, and you may possibly cure the patient with the prescription, but the chances in either case are very much against you.

So, if you recommend six books as representing supreme excellence, each after its own kind, verily likely half the persons who happen to read the list will admit the excellence, but will say that they want excellence of a different sort.

For even the casual person has generally some sort of mental bias or other. One has a taste for history, another for science, another for religious reading, another for fiction. Here is the sort of list that wise and good men usually make up when they are recommending books to other people:

1. The Bible. 2. Dante's "Divine Comedy." 3. Shakespeare's plays. 4. Milton's "Paradise Lost." 5. Plutarch's "Lives." 6. "Penguin's Progress."

This is, of course, a perfectly preposterous list, and if a man had only these six books there would be at least three of them whose covers he would never open. Except, perhaps, in pressing wild fowls. Suppose, however, we attempt to make a selection of six books all of which would be well worth any man's reading, no matter what his individual tastes might be. Here they are:

1. The Bible. 2. Shakespeare's plays. 3. Bacon's "History of the English People." 4. Rousseau's "Social and Political Treatises." 5. Darwin's "Origin of Species." 6. "Penguin's Progress."

That, I think, is a pretty good list. Yet, after all, the personal equation comes in so strongly as to make one very cautious and the reverse of dogmatic in his selection. One thing, perhaps, is well worth noting.

I doubt whether any work of fiction should properly be included among the six books that might be chosen to last one all his life, for, while many works of fiction can be read and reread with interest, perhaps a score of times, they would almost certainly be exhausted sooner than books that are either religious, historical or philosophical.

Nevertheless, assuming that a person cared for nothing except fiction and wished to take into exile six volumes only, I should recommend the following:

1. Scott's "Treasure Island." 2. Balzac's "Woman of Thirty." 3. Thackeray's "Pendennis." 4. Flaubert's "Madame Bovary." 5. Dickens' "Martin Chuzzlewit." 6. Kipling's "Pain Taken From the Hills."

Personally, if I were myself to be imprisoned and to be required to select six books which would have to be my only reading for the rest of my life, I should select the following:

1. The Bible. 2. Bacon's Essays. 3. J. R. Green's "History of the English People." 4. Rousseau's "Social and Political Treatises." 5. Darwin's "Origin of Species." 6. George Moore's "Confessions of a Young Man."

How It Worked. "Yes," said the old inhabitant, "old man Jinks climbed a pine tree to get rid of the life insurance agent, and a hurricane came along and blew the tree down, and as the agent was the first to pull Jinks from under it, he was head palmtree at Jinks' funeral and preached a sermon on the uncertainty of life as he insured the whole town and went his way rejoicing."

Grand Trunk Railway System

The Great Railroad Day at the Pan American, Buffalo, Saturday, September 14th, 1901.

It is expected that on Railroad Day the largest number of railway men will be congregated together than on any former occasion, Buffalo being a great railway centre, having a population of 400,000, a large number of them being engaged in railway work. In order to give the railway men and their friends an opportunity to visit Buffalo, special excursion fares have been arranged by the Grand Trunk Railway System. Tickets will be valid going by all regular trains on Friday, September 13th, and good for return passage by all regular trains on Monday, September 16th. Ask your nearest Grand Trunk Agent about it.

In connection with the excursion the Grand Trunk Railway System will issue engraved souvenir admission tickets to the exposition at 50 cents for adults. These tickets can be purchased from agents at starting points.

Said Tommy to his sister, "Come here before you go. Here's a awful lot of funny things. Which I would like to know. Is a young man an ant and uncle? Is a jaybird always green? Do lightning bugs make lightning? Does a king crab wed a queen? Is the bluebird melancholy? Does a flea enjoy a hop? Do butterflies make butter? Does a skybird ever drop? Is a little bull a bullet? Does a partridge make you quail? Is a person bird a preacher? Can a railbird make a rail? And there is only one thing more About which I really care. Is the Welsh rabbit hare?"

ON CRUTCHES.

Even if you are obliged to use crutches Dr. Hall's Rheumatic Cure can fix you up. This was the experience of John J. Peters, Sheriff of Lake, Ont. He suffered with rheumatism in his legs (crutches) for a year and had to creep about on crutches all the time. Fortunately he tried Dr. Hall's remedy and it only took three bottles to cure him completely. This great blood purifier is put up in bottles containing ten days treatment. Price 50 cents at all drug stores or The Dr. Hall Medicine Co., Kingston, Ont.
