Her work was too delicate for the appreciation of what the theatrical people name the public. Her work was too artistic not to captivate Nathaniel Hawthorns, Edward Clay. Nathaniel Hawthorne, Edmund Clarence Stedman, the most learned critics of literature, and at the other extreme, the people, the sailors and workmen practice in trade, day by day, order, measure and proportion. Hawthorne said that no one expressed the character of New England as well as she, Stedman said that no one had her psychology of Massachusetts, and to those who had known her when she was a young observer in the seacoast towns where her ancestors had been shipbuilders for ages, she was admirable. But none had to be an artist or an artisan to know. In 1901, when a new edition of her works of forty years ago—"The Mor-gensons," "Two Men" and "Temple House"—was printed, it was easy to ed a city or a large town. realize that appreciation of her genius was growing, but that it was growing mong persons, limited in number that-elevated artists or humble work-Ingmen-admire not the commonplace

Mrs. Stoddard took no pains with her fame. She was happy, as Locker was, with ten readers. She and her husband—at the festival of their golden wedding anniversary in June ast year, in their little, beautiful Stuvesant Square home that all Ameriran art lovers love-revealed how profoundly she cared only for the univer-Bal recognition of his genius.

She spoke of her husband only, of the quality of his work, of the conscience in literary criticism that was so sensitive in him, of his heart as oder than he, he having been born in 1825 and she in 1823. She was born at Mattapoisett, and he near there, in Massachusetts

She could not remember an epoch when she had not loved him. The old poet, practically blind now, rested on her to find texts in his library or to walk in the streets. His forefathers had been sailors, hers shipbuilders, and be said, with a winning smile, that his being dependent upon her was in the natural order of things. natural order of things.

They were asked if they were not, because of their experience, in favor of artists marrying. They bent their white heads together and said, sadly: "No, not if they be sensitive artists, anxious not to deprive their children And one remembered painfully that Mr. Stoddard had not written anything subjective since the death of his first son, and that he and his wife were still deploring the death of Lorimer Stoddard, their son, who was in the way of becoming a great playwright.

Mrs. Stoddard's kindness was as extraordinary as her genius. In her books she has expressed her race so well that one may not travel in Massachuetts without finding there, at every step, a detail noted by her. If Massachusetts vanished entirely it would be preserved forever, an imperishable mummy in the cloths of her books Simplicity, emotion, love of humanity, that are in the depths of all poetry, were flush in her poems. They were characteristic of New England because they were characteristic of her, one of its most admirable minds and hearts.
