Building in New York City, is to be 901 feet high, or 150 feet higher than the Woolworth Building. Its estimated cost is between $8,500,000 and $9,000,000. It is intended to be a permanent place of exhibition of products of Latin American countries and of the North American autions. There will be club and hotel facilities, as well as offices for business and professional men affiliated with these industries.

However, the site has not yet been selected. It is said that the Pennsylvania and the Grand Central terminal interests are each desirous of having the big building in its neighborhood.

Robert Lee Dunn, manager of the Pan-American States Association here, says it is the desire of the projectors to have the building completed and ready to be opened simultaneously with the opening of the Panama-Pacific Exhibition at San Francisco in 1915.

Francis H. Kihball, designer of many of the lofty downtown structures is the architect. He has combined elements of Spanish style with the American skycraper form. As designed, the building will be surmounted by a series of towers, narrowing to an apex 901 feet above ground, giving the appearant ance of a gigantic monument, as indeed its projectors hope that it may be, a monument to the peace and prosperity and fellowship of the Pan-American nations.

The form floors will be fitted up as a "Governors' club," where visiting governors from the other states may make them-selves at home.
