

distinguished writers conceived, that the right of Parliament to tax the unrepresented part of England, stands exactly on the same footing with their right to tax America. It conceive, on the contrary, that I have sufficiently explained the important distinction there is between the two cases; a distinction to which a proper attention has not been given, and which constitutes, in my apprehension, the true and essential merits of this great question.

It is evident, that the right of Parliament to tax the unrepresented parts of the Kingdom, arises from the same principles, and is founded on the same authority, as the right of Parliament to tax America. The difference is, that the former is founded on the principles of the English Constitution, and the latter on those of the American Government. The English Constitution is a body of laws, which have been established by the people of England, and are binding upon them, as a law of the land. The American Government is a body of laws, which have been established by the people of America, and are binding upon them, as a law of the land. The English Constitution is a body of laws, which have been established by the people of England, and are binding upon them, as a law of the land. The American Government is a body of laws, which have been established by the people of America, and are binding upon them, as a law of the land.

It is evident, that the right of Parliament to tax the unrepresented parts of the Kingdom, arises from the same principles, and is founded on the same authority, as the right of Parliament to tax America. The difference is, that the former is founded on the principles of the English Constitution, and the latter on those of the American Government. The English Constitution is a body of laws, which have been established by the people of England, and are binding upon them, as a law of the land. The American Government is a body of laws, which have been established by the people of America, and are binding upon them, as a law of the land.