ARMED CROOKS
ROB BAKERY

Their attention was attracted by a motor car driving into the driveway. Two others arrive.

They temporarily ceased operations and the two of the men hurried below to the drive shed. Leo Boag, 528 Manning avenue, and Harry Gillard, drivers for the Canada Bread, were entering with a car which they were returning to Stevenson who had lent it to them earlier in the evening. Boag was opening the sliding drive shed door when one of the thieves called over to him to come inside.

Again the detective was worked and Boag was charged, with being out delivering whiskey. By this time Harry Gillard, 528 Manning avenue, had driven the car to the door and he, too, was covered by the two men. They were told that the other three men had been arrested and were upstairs waiting to be taken away. They were taken upstairs and also bound to posts. Gillard called for help and struggled with the marauders when they attempted to fasten his hands behind his back. He was struck and two handkerchiefs were tied over his mouth. With all five men held prisoner with ropes and wires, two of the thugs remained covering them with guns while the others proceeded to "crack" the safe. The combination handle was forced off with the jimmy and a charge of nitro-glycerine inserted in the hole. The explosion of the charge blew half of the right hand side of the door off. The concussion of the blow did not shatter any of the windows nor attract the attention of persons in the vicinity. With the door off, the thieves looted the safe and stole all of the Saturday cash receipts, which amounted to close to $3,000 in silver and bills of all denominations. Examination of the office showed that nearly all of the desks had been ransacked. The vault in the same office compartment was not touched. It contained papers and over $300 in small change which is used to supply the bread drivers with change in the mornings before going out on the delivery.

After securing the money the five men withdrew from the office, locked the door and fastened it and the one leading to where the five employees were held prisoners. They then withdrew to the stables below, started a motor car, drove out to Pearsa avenue and escaped. The five men were held prisoners. They then withdrew to the stables below, started a motor car, drove out to Pearsa avenue and escaped. The five men were held prisoners. They then withdrew to the stables below, started a motor car, drove out to Pearsa avenue and escaped.

Gillard worked his wrists until he had freed one of them. He then placed his hand in his pocket and withdrawing a pocket knife released himself. He then went over to his four comrades, some of whom had been tied with horse reins.

After releasing them they tried to open the door of the room to call the police. Unable to force the door they climbed thru the "skylight" to the roof of the building and from there got down on to the roof of the drive shed, then dropped to the street.

This was at 2 o'clock Sunday morning. The police of Davenport station were notified and detectives were despatched in motor cars to the offices. Patrol-Sergeant Egan recovered the firm's stolen car on Davenport road and drove it back to the stables.

Left Few Clues. A careful search of the building was made, but nothing found that would form a clue to the identity of the crooks. They left two large "jimmies" lying on the floor near the safe and a coin about the size of a fifty cent piece was found. This bore a device reading Massachusetts.

Inspector of Detectives Guthrie told The World that the men were experienced hands at safe blowing by the manner in which they worked.

He is of the opinion that it is the work of a gang from the United States. This theory is substantiated by the statements of some of the men who were held up. They told Detective Young that one of the men spoke with a Yankee accent.

Detectives examined the five employees and were satisfied with their stories. "The men told a straightforward story of the affair and we are well satisfied with their actions considering the helpless position they were placed in when they were covered with guns from all angles," said the detective.

Loitering Around. Mr. Bredin, Junior, speaking to The World, said the superintendent of the bakery had complained that three men had been loitering around the premises three days previous to the holdup. On one occasion, he said, the men were hanging around the stables and when the superintendent approached them they asked if a certain man were employed there.

An effort was made to ascertain the information asked for, but when the man returned to give it to the two men they had left. It is the belief of Mr. Bredin that these men were involved in Saturday night's affair.

Mr. Bredin, the watchman directed his cries to McBride's garage, a short distance on Avenue road from the bakery. Green said that a policeman crossed the road and said, "if there is anyone in the building, get them yourself."

Inspector Ben Dillworth of Davenport police station, said last night that he had not heard of any such complaint. He said that he heard that a patrol sergeant and a constable were taking place but that they had heard no explosion, or cries for help. The president of the commission regarding the lay out of the premises had been furnished the gang. To bear this statement out, the president of the commission, who was in the building at the time, stated that he had seen a building in which a vault and safe were situated close by one another, would be most likely to attempt to open the vault, then the safe.

Pieces of the safe and the broken lock were taken last night to headquarters. It was found that a second charge of explosive had been used to force the safe. An electric drill had
