A DISTURBING NOTE.

THAPTER 52. The following morning Louise awoke bered there was no Harry to make breakfast for this morning and no early train to hurry him off to catch. She looked under the pillow at her watch. Eight o'clock, an hour later than she head been getting up, but certainly had been getting up, but certainly more than an hour too early for this "We had very little conversation," more than an hour too early for this household to be stirring.

So she lay back in bed again, glad to be able to relax and rest, yet far from happy. Harry had had a whole day now to think about her absence. For the first time she began to wonder what he would do. Then the delicious sense of comfort and warmth stole over her again, and she snuggled under the covers and dozed until 10 o'clock.

Indeed, Anne had to wake her.

"Your mother is up and wants to "We had very l'ttle conversation," Mrs. Driscom remarked dryly.

Louise broke open the letter.

"My dearest wife," the letter began. "I don't know what to say or what to think. I am feeling utterly amazed and confused and guilty and forlorn are little bit hurt, too."

"I did not know things were as bad as you seemed to think them. I know it's been awfully hard and that you have been very brave and good to stand it as long as you did, but I didn't with her in her room," she said, closing the windows and turning on the heat as she talked.

"Of course I will," Louise answered, reaching for her bath robe.

"Then I'll serve it in your mother's boudoir right away," the woman said.

"You look a heap better this morning than when you came yesterday," she added, looking critically at Louise. "It is most remarkable what a little sleep will do for a person."

It was indeed Louise thought, as she dressed quickly. She was feeling better than she had been for weeks. Her mother, in the same frivolous cap and gown, was seated by the small table in the bay window when Louise entered. She was going thru a pile of letters. Unsocial as her life was actually, she still seemed to keep up a voluminous correspondence. She looked up as she greeted her daughter, and her expression was one of anxiety. She held one letter away from the pile, face down.
