Abuse of the Eyes.

Abuse of Q.—Does excessive reading injure the eyesight?

It does if the print is as small as most bewspaper print. It does if the light is poor or not so arranged as to be outside of the direct vision of the reader's eyea. It does if the reader does not frequently interrupt his concentration on the page to look off at distant objects—objects more than 20 feet away.

Q.—Is there any harm done by the habit of reading while lying in bed? It is immaterial whether one lies abed or stands on his head to read, provided the light be correctly arranged and the reader interrupts frequently to look at distant objects.

Q.—Please tell me whether one can strain the eyes by reading fast, that is to say, hurriedly scanning a paragraph or page, instead of carefully reading each word?

It is immaterial, so long as the other conditions are right, whether you read a single letter or a whole sentence or a paragraph at a glance.

Q.—Just what is the best artificial light for reading and sewing?

Kerosene, goe or electric lamp, so arranged that the light shall fall in sufficient quantity upon the page or piece in hand without falling upon the reader's or worker's face. Let the light come over the shoulder, right or left as may be most convenient, and see to it that your face is mostly in shadow as you sit or stand at work. The source of light should be invisible as you sit or stand at work. It is a great mistake to resort to eyeshades to protect the eyes

With a little care, all scraps can be put to good use, and the saving in soap, now so expensive, is very considerable. Besides, it is easy to make up soap scraps into several convenient sorts of aid to cleanlines. Kitchen soap scraps should go into the soap-shaker, to be used in making suds for the dishes.
