

Master's work, chiefly within the bounds of the Niagara Conference. For several years, during the latter part of his life, he lived in Dakota, but continued his connection with the Ingersoll (Charles Street) Quarterly Board. We learned, from his new home, that his zeal did not abate in his Master's cause, but that he preached as opportunity offered, and in many other ways was in labors abundant until he was stricken down with paralysis on the last day of March, 1895, from which he never completely recovered, and another stroke of that same dreaded disease, about the 10th of May of the same year, deprived him of the power of speech, and on the 18th of May he passed peacefully and trustfully to join the blood-washed throng in that happy land, the inhabitants of which never have to say, I am sick, and where the weary itinerant's journey is ended and the final home is reached.
