Violation of (Parking) rights

Do you own a car? Do you drive it to university everyday? I do, and most of the time I find it very hard to find a parking space. In the parking lot in front of the SUB, there is a small section allotted to faculty/staff parking, this section is clearly marked with signs stating the parking designation. These signs are extremely useful to students who have not memorized the map of the campus and its parking allocation. Last week I parked by the Harriet Irving library, and to my surprise I received a parking ticket for parking in a faculty/staff zone. I was sure that I had not seen any signs up, restricting students from parking there; but, just to be sure I took the time out to look around. I did not see one sign. This is particularly disturbing to me, because this is a Class B violation that carries a $10 fine. I strongly feel, that if the university is going to impose such fines on students, they have a responsibility to the students to place signs at these areas. Contrary to the obvious views of those in charge, not all students are incredibly wealthy, and have nothing better to do than inconvenience faculty and staff by taking their parking spaces. Rather, I agree with the gentleman who last week emphasized that the fine might mean a reduction in the groceries a student will be able to buy that week.

I fully understand that the university has fulfilled its legal obligations, by having maps available at the security office and the odd sign up every here and there. Then why do I get recurring these images of a venus fly trap, with me being the fly. As the masthead states, this is my opinion, and I feel that students are being exploited.
