FOOD SCARCITY IN GERMANY
All Fats are Lacking and Butter is Unknown

Nobody ever has anything tried these days in German cities and towns without a special feast is on and the householder or host has a remarkable piece of luck in securing fat of some sort. Fats of every kind are lacking. Travelers from Germany to Rotterdam say butter is practically unknown. Now and then a householder may secure half a pound of margarine at $1 a pound. Lard is as scarce as butter.

The one greasy food that can be obtained in limited quantities in certain districts of Germany is the little candied French sardine. How it gets into Germany no one seems to know.

"My grocer always had some sardines," explained a neutral woman who was going back to the United States, where I can eat all I want of it." He doled them out sparingly without any government regulation she said, but a bestcase fried in the fish oil was very unlike a butterfat.

There has never been a shortage of lemons and oranges, according to various persons from various parts of Germany. The supply of sugar has been maintained as yet but the supply of citrus fruits, which reach Germany by diverse routes from various warm countries, is fast becoming scarce.

Eggs in April were sixty cents a dozen and laying hens were so valuable that no chickens were killed for food until their laying capacity declined. A dressed chicken in a Cologne shop brought $2.50 during the day. While it rested in the shop window many persons stopped to look at it.

The shooting of pigeons in the streets or on the rooftops is severely punished but it is said that the pigeon population is being rapidly diminished.
Gepeln crews that have passed over Berlin at low altitudes in recent celebrations have commented on the number of pigeons that have been seen on the roofs of old buildings.

Undoubtedly Germany has food—beef, pork, fats, oils and most of the other commodities that make eating worth while. Where do they go? Who gets them?

The soldiers. Behind the German lines are cattle sheds always full of live stock. From all I could hear in Berlin the Germans are not eating complaints to make of their food.

A civilian in Germany these days is an incubus. More or less, he must feed himself and his family on the scraps left behind by the soldiers.

The next three months, until crop time will of course be the hardest of the year for German civilians. They are struggling along with last year's leavings. All Germany is waiting with bated breath, to see how the autumn crops turn out.

STRANGE EYE DISEASE
IN THE GERMAN RANKS
Men Afflicted With It Can See in Daytime, But Not at Night

German and Austrian army doctors note a new kind of eye disease which affects many soldiers at night. They cannot see then, though their sight is normal in the day time. But men thus affected stumble like blind men as soon as night falls and have to be led, or else they fall into the many holes made by shells.

Dr. Nietfeld, of the German navy, has a theory that the disease is owing to the lack of what he calls vitamin, a secretion necessary to good sight.
Vitamin is formed chiefly by eating fresh vegetables, and the Kaiser's troops have not been getting anything but tinned food through the winter.

With the coming of summer and fresh greenstuffs this mysterious eye affection has almost disappeared.

Another German medical expert named Paul declares that all canned foods are devoid of vitamin, which disappears on cooking food at very high temperature.

ENGLAND'S FIRST CHERRIES Improved Fruit Introduced From Flanders in Sixteenth Century

Cherries are among the good things we seem to owe to Flanders. Cherries of sorts were grown in England in Roman times, but the modern improved cherry, if John Evelyn may be relied upon, was introduced from Flanders in the sixteenth century.

It was in the Sittingbourne district of Kent that our homes pario Richard Harrys (fruiterer to Henry the VIII) planted by his great cost and rare industry the sweet cherry about the year of our Lord Christ 1533. And Kent grows the best cherries till this day. From the railway train you may see a cherry-stone into that earliest Kentish orchard.

An excellent way to flatter a woman is to keep still and listen.
